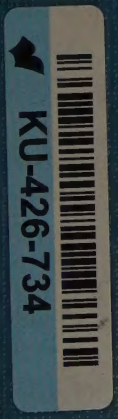
THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS

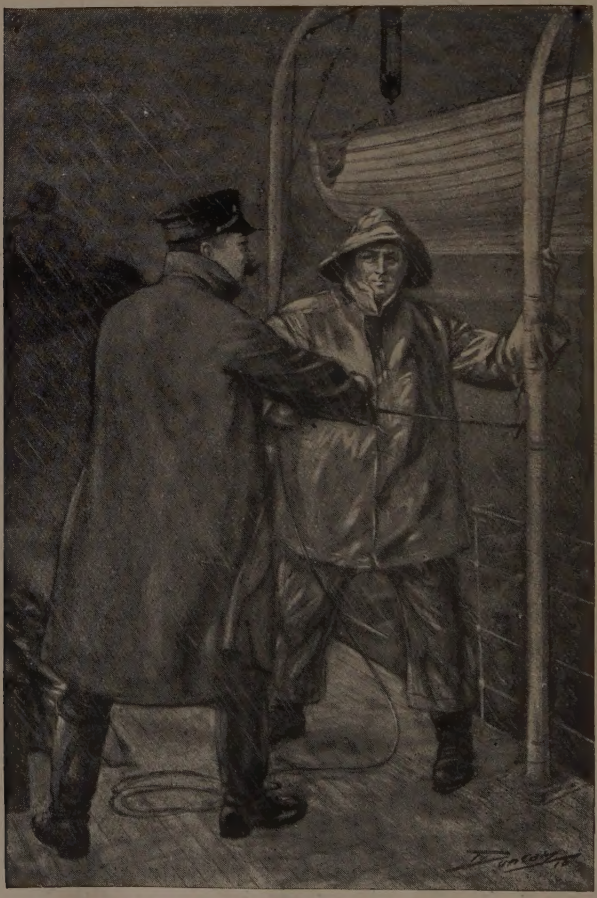
Erskine Childers



KU-426-734

C.H. Clough.
Replacement of copy of
Jan. 26. 1946. 5 lbs. 1/-

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS



It was one who, in Germany, has a better right to insist than any one else.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS

A RECORD OF SECRET SERVICE

BY

ERSKINE CHILDERS

THOMAS NELSON AND SONS, LTD.
LONDON, EDINBURGH, AND NEW YORK

XVIII. Imperial Escort 21
XIX. The Rubicon 21
XX. The Little Drab Book 23
XXI. Blindfold to Memmert 24
XXII. The Quartette 26
XXIII. A Change of Tactics 27
XXIV. Finesse 29
XXV. I Double Back 31
XXVI. The Seven Siels 32
XXVII. The Luck of the Stowaway . . . 34
XXVIII. We Achieve our Double Aim . . 36
Epilogue 37

MAPS AND CHARTS

MAP A 11
CHART A 12
MAP B 13
CHART B 14

PREFACE

TO THE ORIGINAL EDITION

WORD about the origin and authorship of this book.
In October last (1902), my friend " Carruthers " visited in my chambers, and, under a provisional pledge of recy, told me frankly the whole of the adventure scribed in these pages. Till then I had only known much as the rest of his friends, namely, that he had ently undergone experiences during a yachting cruise th a certain Mr. " Davies " which had left a deep rk on his character and habits.

At the end of his narrative—which, from its bearing studies and speculations of my own, as well as from intrinsic interest and racy delivery, made a very deep pression on me—he added that the important facts covered in the course of the cruise had, without a ment's delay, been communicated to the proper thorities, who, after some dignified incredulity, due part, perhaps, to the pitiful inadequacy of their own ret service, had, he believed, made use of them, to ert a great national danger. I say " he believed," though it was beyond question that the danger was erted for the time, it was doubtful whether they had rred a foot to combat it, the secret discovered being of such a nature that mere suspicion of it on this side was likely to destroy its efficacy.

There, however that may be, the matter rested for a while, as, for personal reasons which will be manifest to the reader, he and Mr. "Davies" expressly wished it to rest.

But events were driving them to reconsider their decision. These seemed to show that the information wrung with such peril and labour from the German Government, and transmitted so promptly to our own, had had none but the most transitory influence on our policy. Forced to the conclusion that the national security was really being neglected, the two friends now had a mind to make their story public; and it was about this that "Carruthers" wished for my advice. The great drawback was that an Englishman, bearing an honoured name, was disgracefully implicated, and that unless infinite delicacy were used, innocent persons, and, especially, a young lady, would suffer pain and indignity, if his identity were known. Indeed, troublesome rumours, containing a grain of truth and a mass of falsehood, were already afloat.

After weighing both sides of the question, I gave my vote emphatically for publication. The personal drawbacks could, I thought, with tact be neutralised; while from the public point of view, nothing but good could come from submitting the case to the common sense of the country at large. Publication, therefore, was agreed upon, and the next point was the form it should take. "Carruthers," with the concurrence of Mr. "Davies," was for a bald exposition of the essential facts, stripped of their warm human envelope. I was strongly against this course, first, because it would aggravate instead of llaying the rumours that were current; secondly, be-ause in such a form the narrative would not carry onviction, and would thus defeat its own end. The ersons and the events were indissolubly connected; to vade, abridge, suppress, would be to convey to the eader the idea of a concocted hoax. Indeed, I took older ground still, urging that the story should be made s explicit and circumstantial as possible, frankly and onestly for the purpose of entertaining and so of ttracting a wide circle of readers. Even anonymity as undesirable. Nevertheless, certain precautions were mperatively needed.

To cut the matter short, they asked for my assistance nd received it at once. It was arranged that I should dit the book; that "Carruthers" should give me his iary and recount to me in fuller detail and from his wn point of view all the phases of the "quest," as hey used to call it; that Mr. "Davies" should meet ie with his charts and maps and do the same; and that he whole story should be written, as from the mouth f the former, with its humours and errors, its light and s dark side, just as it happened; with the following ew limitations. The year it belongs to is disguised; he names of persons are throughout fictitious; and, at ny instance, certain slight liberties have been taken to onceal the identity of the English characters.

Remember, also, that these persons are living now in he midst of us, and if you find one topic touched on ith a light and hesitating pen do not blame the Editor, ho, whether they are known or not, would rather say oo little than say a word that might savour of imertinence.

E. C.

March, 1903.

NOTE

THE fragments of charts (Charts A and B) are reproductions, on a slightly reduced scale, and omitting some confusing and irrelevant details, of British and German Admiralty Charts. Space precludes the insertion of those bulky engravings in full; but the reader who wishes for fuller information is referred to Charts Nos. 406 and 407 of the British series, and to No. 64 of the German series.

The maps are necessarily on a very small scale; but can be supplemented by reference to standard publications.

GENERAL MAP
to illustrate the cruise of the Dulcibella, and matters relating thereto.
English Miles, 69.16 to a degree.
Geographical Miles, 60 to a degree.
Soundings at low water shown thus Shoals at low water shown by dotted line
NORTH SEA
DENMARK
Scheswig Holstein
Hamburg HOLLAND
GERMANY
Norfolk
Suffolk
King's Lynn Yarmouth
The Wash
R. Humber
Flamborough Head
Spurn Head Lincolnshire
Yorkshire
Dutch (or West) Frisian Islands
German (or East) Frisian Islands
East Friesland
Emden
Leer
Oldenburg
Bremen
Bremerhaven
Harlingen
Texel
Zuider Zee
Amsterdam
Helgoland
Heligoland
Flensburg
Schleswig Kiel
Husum
Tönning
Eckernförde
Kappeln
Sarup
Aabenraa
Hadersleben
Tondern
Cuxhaven
Stade
Rendsburg
Kiel Canal
Eider
Elbe
Weser
Ems
Rhine
Zuyder Zee
Texel
Vlie
Ameland
Schiermonnikoog
Borkum
Norderney
Juist
Baltrum
Langeoog
Spiekeroog
Wangeroog
Minsener Oog
Mellum
Neuwerk
Scharhörn
Trischen Westerhever
Eiderstedt
Nordstrand
Pellworm
Amrum
Sylt
Föhr
Rømø
Fanø
Mandø
Rockall
Lizard
Land's End
North Foreland Dungeness
Beachy Head
Portland Bill Start Point
Eddystone
Lundy Island
Scilly Islands
Round Tower
Germania Limit of German Waters
Western Boundary of German Waters Longitude East & of Greenwich
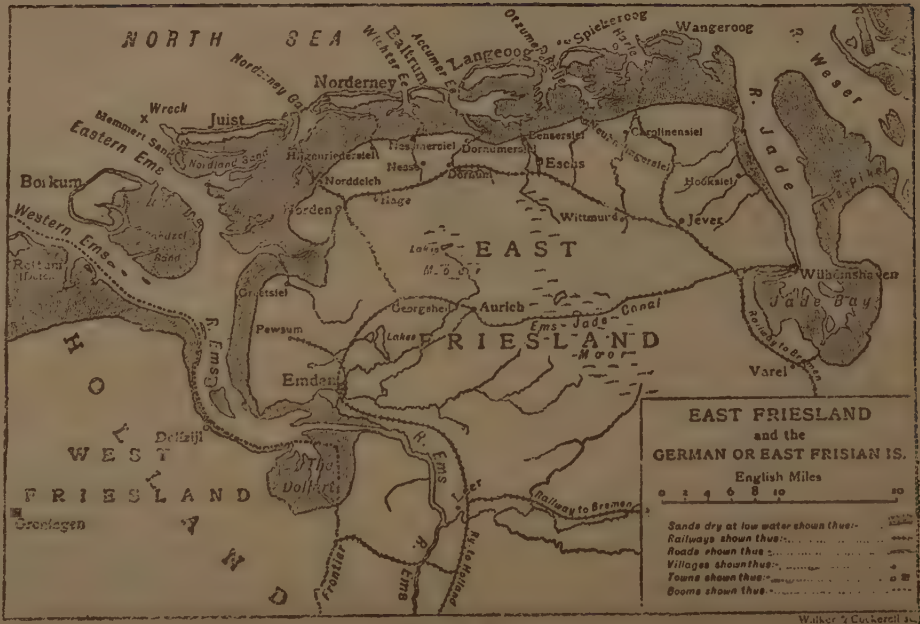
Walker & Cockerell

MAP A.



NORTH SEA
Norderney
Langeoog
Spiekeroog
Wangeroog
Juist
Wreck
Memmert Sand
Eastern Ems
Nordland Sand
Borkum
Western Ems
Hilgenriedersiel
Norddeich
Norden
Neuharlingersiel
Dornumersiel
Dornum
Esens
Bensersiel
Carolinensiel
Harlesiel
Hooksiel
Jever
Wittmund
R. Jade
R. Weser
Wilhelmshaven
Jade Bay
Varel
EAST FRIESLAND
Greetsiel
Georgsheil
Auricb
Ems-Jade Canal
Pewsum
Emden
R. Ems
HOLLAND
WEST FRIESLAND
Delfzijl
The Dollart
Groningen Railway to Bremen Frontier
R. Ems
Aurich to Harlesiel
EAST FRIESLAND
and the
GERMAN OR EAST FRISIAN IS.
English Miles
0 2 4 6 8 10 20
Sands dry at low water shown thus Railways shown thus Roads shown thus Villages shown thus Towns shown thus Dams shown thus
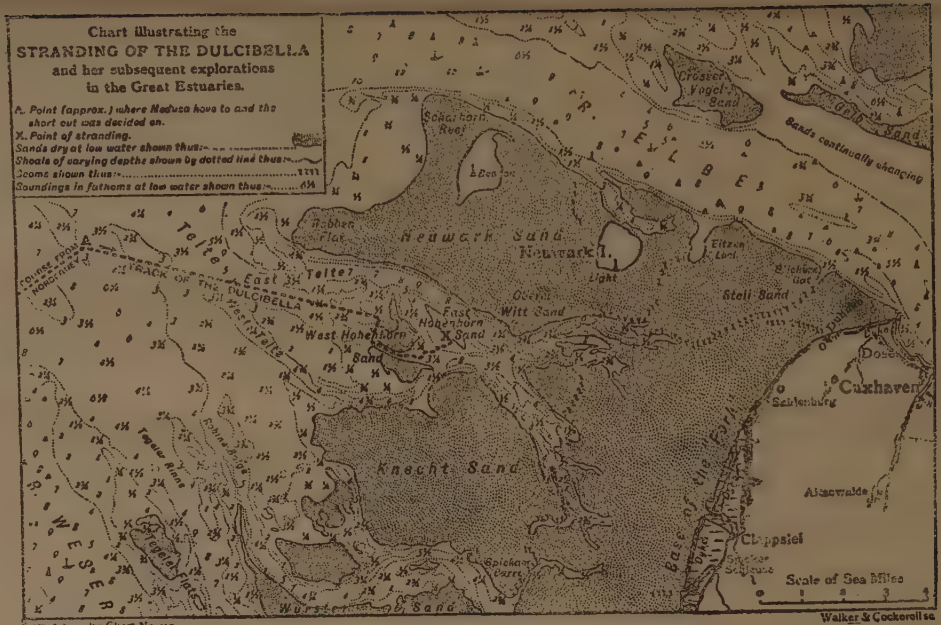
Walker & Cockerell

MAP B.



from Admiralty Chart No. 407.

CHART A.

Chart of JUIST, MEMMERT, and part of NORDERNEY.
to illustrate Chaps. xxi. xxii & xxvii.
Our course in Dinghy shown thus:-
Sands dry at low water shown thus:-
Shoals of varying depths shown by dotted line thus:- Booms shown thus:-
Soundings in Metres at low water shown in figures ... to NORTH SEA
JUIST
NORDERNEY I.
Town
Sand Dunes
Hohes Riff
(Sand)
Memmert
Sand
Nordland
Sand
Plate
(Sand)
Osterloog
Norddeich
Norden
Kolper Sand Scale of Sea Miles
0 1 2 3 4
From the German Admiralty large-scale Chart. (No. 64.)
Walker & Cockerell Sc.

CHART B.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS

CHAPTER I

THE LETTER

I HAVE read of men who, when forced by their calling to live for long periods in utter solitude—save for few black faces—have made it a rule to dress regularly or dinner in order to maintain their self-respect and revent a relapse into barbarism. It was in some such pirit, with an added touch of self-consciousness, that, t seven o'clock in the evening of September 23rd in a ecent year, I was making my evening toilet in my hambers in Pall Mall. I thought the date and the lace justified the parallel; to my advantage even; for ne obscure Burmese administrator might well be a nan of blunted sensibilities and coarse fibre, and at east he is alone with nature, while I—well, a young nan of condition and fashion, who knows the right eople, belongs to the right clubs, has a safe, possibly brilliant, future in the Foreign Office—may be excused or a sense of complacent martyrdom, when, with his keen ppreciation of the social calendar, he is doomed to the uter solitude of London in September. I say "martyrdom," but in fact the case was infinitely worse. For to feel oneself a martyr, as everybody knows, is a pleasurable thing, and the true tragedy of my position was that I had passed that stage. I had enjoyed what sweets it had to offer in ever dwindling degree since the middle of August, when ties were still fresh and sympathy abundant. I had been conscious that I was missed at Morven Lodge party. Lady Ashleigh herself had said so in the kindest possible manner, when she wrote to acknowledge the letter in which I explained, with an effectively austere reserve of language, that circumstances compelled me to remain at my office. "We know how busy you must be just now," she wrote, "and I do hope you won't overwork; we shall all miss you very much." Friend after friend "got away" to sport and fresh air, with promises to write and chaffing condolences, and as each deserted the sinking ship, I took a grim delight in my misery, positively almost enjoying the first week or two after my world had been finally dissipated to the four bracing winds of heaven. I began to take a spurious interest in the remaining five millions, and wrote several clever letters in a vein of cheap satire, indirectly suggesting the pathos of my position, but indicating that I was broad-minded enough to find intellectual entertainment in the scenes, persons, and habits of London in the dead season. I even did rational things at the instigation of others. For, though I should have liked total isolation best, I, of course, found that there was a sediment of unfortunates like myself, who, unlike me, viewed the situation in a most prosaic light. There were river excursions, and so on, after office-hours; but I dislike the river at any time for its noisy vulgarity, and most of all at this season. So I dropped out of fresh air brigade and declined H—'s offer to share iverside cottage and run up to town in the mornings. id spend one or two week-ends with the Catesbys in nt; but I was not inconsolable when they let their use and went abroad, for I found that such partial npensations did not suit me. Neither did the taste satirical observation last. A passing thirst, which lare say many have shared, for adventures of the cinating kind described in the "New Arabian Nights" me on a few evenings into some shady haunts in no and further eastward; but was finally quenched e sultry Saturday night after an hour's immersion in e reeking atmosphere of a low music-hall in Ratcliffe ghway, where I sat next a portly female who suffered m the heat, and at frequent intervals refreshed her- f and an infant from a bottle of tepid stout.

By the first week in September I had abandoned all lliatives, and had settled into the dismal but dignified utine of office, club, and chambers. And now came e most cruel trial, for the hideous truth dawned on e that the world I found so indispensable could after dispense with me. It was all very well for Lady hleigh to assure me that I was deeply missed; but letter from F—, who was one of the party, written n haste, just starting to shoot," and coming as a dy reply to one of my cleverest, made me aware that e house party had suffered little from my absence, l that few sighs were wasted on me, even in the quarter ich I had assumed to have been discreetly alluded by the underlined all in Lady Ashleigh's "we shall all ss you." A thrust which smarted more, if it bit less eply, came from my cousin Nesta, who wrote: "It's rrid for you to have to be baking in London now; but, after all, it must be a great pleasure to you" (malicious little wretch!) "to have such interesting and important work to do." Here was a nemesis for an innocent illusion I had been accustomed to foster in the minds of my relations and acquaintances, especially in the breasts of the trustful and admiring maidens whom I had taken down to dinner in the last two seasons; a fiction which I had almost reached the point of believing in myself. For the plain truth was that my work was neither interesting nor important, and consisted chiefly at present in smoking cigarettes, in saying that Mr. So-and-So was away and would be back about October 1st, in being absent for lunch from twelve till two, and in my spare moments making précis of—let us say—the less confidential consular reports, and squeezing the results into cast-iron schedules. The reason of my detention was not a cloud on the international horizon—though I may say in passing that there was such a cloud—but a caprice on the part of a remote and mighty personage, the effect of which, ramifying downwards, had dislocated the carefully-laid holiday plans of the humble juniors, and in my own small case had upset the arrangement between myself and K—, who positively liked the dog-days in Whitehall.

Only one thing was needed to fill my cup of bitterness, and this it was that specially occupied me as I dressed for dinner this evening. Two days more in this dead and fermenting city and my slavery would be at an end. Yes, but—irony of ironies!—I had nowhere to go to! The Morven Lodge party was breaking up. A dreadful rumour as to an engagement which had been one of its accursed fruits tormented me with the fresh certainty that I had not been missed, and bred in me that most solating brand of cynicism which is produced by defeat rough insignificance. Invitations for a later date, nich I had declined in July with a gratifying sense of ing much in request, now rose up spectrally to taunt e. There was at least one which I could easily have vived, but neither in this case nor in any other had ere been any renewal of pressure, and there are mo-ents when the difference between proposing oneself d surrendering as a prize to one of several eagerly mpeting hostesses seems too crushing to be contem-ated. My own people were at Aix for my father's ut; to join them was a pis aller whose banality was pellent. Besides, they would be leaving soon for our me in Yorkshire, and I was not a prophet in my own untry. In short, I was at the extremity of depression. The usual preliminary scuffle on the staircase prepared e for the knock and entry of Withers. (One of the ings which had for some time ceased to amuse me is the laxity of manners, proper to the season, among e servants of the big block of chambers where I lived.) ithers demurely handed me a letter bearing a German st-mark and marked "Urgent." I had just finished essing, and was collecting my money and gloves. A omentary thrill of curiosity broke in upon my depres-n as I sat down to open it. A corner on the reverse the envelope bore the blotted legend: "Very sorry, t there's one other thing—a pair of rigging screws m Carey and Neilson's, size 1⅜, galvanised." Here is:—

Yacht "Dulcibella," Flensburg, Schleswig-Holstein, Sept. 21st.

DEAR CARRUTHERS,—I daresay you'll be surprised at aring from me, as it's ages since we met. It is more than likely, too, that what I'm going to suggest won't suit you, for I know nothing of your plans, and if you're in town at all you're probably just getting into harness again and can't get away. So I merely write on the offchance to ask if you would care to come out here and join me in a little yachting, and, I hope, duck shooting. I know you're keen on shooting, and I sort of remember that you have done some yachting too, though I rather forget about that. This part of the Baltic—the Schleswig fiords—is a splendid cruising-ground—A1 scenery—and there ought to be plenty of duck about soon, if it gets cold enough I came out here via Holland and the Frisian Islands, starting early in August. My pals have had to leave me, and I'm badly in want of another, as I don't want to lay up yet for a bit. I needn't say how glad I should be if you could come. If you can, send me a wire to the P. O. here. Flushing and on by Hamburg will be your best route, I think. I'm having a few repairs done here, and will have them ready sharp by the time your train arrives. Bring your gun and a good lot of No. 4's; and would you mind calling at Lancaster's and asking for mine, and bringing it too? Bring some oilskins. Better get the eleven-shilling sort, jacket and trousers—not the "yachting" brand; and if you paint bring your gear. I know you speak German like a native, and that will be a great help. Forgive this hail of directions, but I've a sort of feeling that I'm in luck and that you'll come. Anyway, I hope you and the F. O. both flourish. Good-bye.—Yours ever,

ARTHUR H. DAVIES.

Would you mind bringing me out a prismatic compass, and a pound of Raven mixture?

This letter marked an epoch for me; but I little suspected the fact as I crumpled it into my pocket and started languidly on the voie douloureuse which I nightly followed to the club. In Pall Mall there were no dignified greetings to be exchanged now with well-groomed acquaintances. The only people to be seen were some late stragglers from the park, with a perambulator and some hot and dusty children lagging fretfully behind; some rustic sightseers draining the last dregs of the daylight in an effort to make out from their guide-books which of these reverend piles was which; a policeman and a builder's cart. Of course the club was a strange one, both of my own being closed for cleaning, a coincidence expressly planned by Providence for my inconvenience. The club which you are "permitted to make use of" on these occasions always irritates with its strangeness and discomfort. The few occupants seem odd and oddly dressed, and you wonder how they got there. The particular weekly that you want is not taken in; the dinner is execrable, and the ventilation a farce. All these evils oppressed me to-night. And yet I was puzzled to find that somewhere within me there was a faint lightening of the spirits; causeless, as far as I could discover. It could not be Davies's letter. Yachting in the Baltic at the end of September! The very idea made one shudder. Cowes, with a pleasant party and hotels handy, was all very well. An August cruise on a steam yacht in French waters or the Highlands was all very well; but what kind of a yacht was this? It must be of a certain size to have got so far, but I thought I remembered enough of Davies's means to know that he had no money to waste on luxuries. That brought me to the man himself. I had known him at Oxford—not as one of my immediate set; but we were a sociable college, and I had seen a good deal of him, liking him for his physical energy combined with a certain simplicity and modesty, though, indeed, he had nothing to be conceited about; liked him, in fact, in the way that at that receptive period one likes many men whom one never keeps up with later. We had both gone down in the same year—three years ago now. I had gone to France and Germany for two years to learn the languages; he had failed for the Indian Civil, and then had gone into a solicitor's office. I had only seen him since at rare intervals, though I admitted to myself that for his part he had clung loyally to what ties of friendship there were between us. But the truth was that we had drifted apart from the nature of things. I had passed brilliantly into my profession, and on the few occasions I had met him since I made my triumphant debut in society I had found nothing left in common between us. He seemed to know none of my friends, he dressed indifferently, and I thought him dull. I had always connected him with boats and the sea, but never with yachting, in the sense that I understood it. In college days he had nearly persuaded me into sharing a squalid week in some open boat he had picked up, and was going to sail among some dreary mud-flats somewhere on the east coast. There was nothing else, and the funereal function of dinner drifted on. But I found myself remembering at the entrée that I had recently heard, at second or third hand, of something else about him—exactly what I could not recall. When I reached the savoury, I had concluded, so far as I had centred my mind on it at all, that the whole thing was a culminating irony, as, indeed, was the savoury in its way.

ter the wreck of my pleasant plans and the fiasco of v martyrdom, to be asked as consolation to spend tober freezing in the Baltic with an eccentric nonen-y who bored me! Yet, as I smoked my cigar in the astly splendour of the empty smoking-room, the subject me up again. Was there anything in it? There re certainly no alternatives at hand. And to bury yself in the Baltic at this unearthly time of year had least a smack of tragic thoroughness about it.

I pulled out the letter again, and ran down its im-lsive staccato sentences, affecting to ignore what a st of fresh air, high spirits, and good fellowship this msy bit of paper wafted into the jaded club-room.
n reperusal, it was full of evil presage—"Ar scenery" but what of equinoctial storms and October fogs?
very sane yachtsman was paying off his crew now.
There ought to be duck"—vague, very vague. "If gets cold enough" . . . cold and yachting seemed to a gratuitously monstrous union. His pals had left m; why? "Not the 'yachting' brand"; and why t? As to the size, comfort, and crew of the yacht all cheerfully ignored; so many maddening blanks.
nd, by the way, why in Heaven's name "a prismatic mpass"? I fingered a few magazines, played a me of fifty with a friendly old fogey, too importu-te to be worth the labour of resisting, and went back my chambers to bed, ignorant that a friendly Province had come to my rescue; and, indeed, rather senting any clumsy attempt at such friendliness.

CHAPTER II

THE "DULCIBELLA"

THAT two days later I should be found pacing the deck of the Flushing steamer with a ticket for Hamburg in my pocket may seem a strange result, yet not so strange if you have divined my state of mind. You will guess, at any rate, that I was armed with the conviction that I was doing an act of obscure penance, rumours of which might call attention to my lot and perhaps awaken remorse in the right quarter, while it left me free to enjoy myself unobtrusively in the remote event of enjoyment being possible.

The fact was that, at breakfast on the morning after the arrival of the letter, I had still found that inexplicable lightening which I mentioned before, and strong enough to warrant a revival of the pros and cons. An important pro which I had not thought of before was that after all it was a good-natured piece of unselfishness to join Davies; for he had spoken of the want of a pal, and seemed honestly to be in need of me. I almost clutched at this consideration. It was an admirable excuse, when I reached my office that day, for a resigned study of the Continental Bradshaw, and an order to Carter to unroll a great creaking wall-map of Germany and find me Flensburg. The latter labour I might have saved him, but it was good for Carter to have something to do; and his patient ignorance was amusing. With most of the map and what it suggested I was tolerably familiar, for I had not wasted my year in Germany, whatever I had done or not done since. Its people, history, progress, and future had interested me tensely, and I had still friends in Dresden and Berlin. ensburg recalled the Danish war of '64, and by the ne Carter's researches had ended in success I had rgotten the task set him, and was wondering whether e prospect of seeing something of that lovely region of hleswig-Holstein,* as I knew from hearsay that it as, was at all to be set against such an uncomfortable ay of seeing it, with the season so late, the company unattractive, and all the other drawbacks which I unted and treasured as proofs of my desperate con- tion, if I were to go. It needed little to decide me, d I think K—'s arrival from Switzerland, offensively nburnt, was the finishing touch. His greeting was Hullo, Carruthers, you here? Thought you had got vay long ago. Lucky devil, though, to be going now, st in time for the best driving and the early pheasants. ne heat's been shocking out there. Carter, bring me Bradshaw"—(an extraordinary book, Bradshaw, rned to from habit, even when least wanted, as men ndle guns and rods in the close season).

By lunch-time the weight of indecision had been moved, and I found myself entrusting Carter with a legram to Davies, P.O., Flensburg. "Thanks; expect e 9.34 p.m. 26th"; which produced, three hours later reply: "Delighted; please bring a No. 3 Rippingille ove"—a perplexing and ominous direction, which mehow chilled me in spite of its subject matter.

Indeed, my resolution was continually faltering. It tered when I turned out my gun in the evening and ought of the grouse it ought to have accounted for. faltered again when I contemplated the miscellaneous t of commissions, sown broadcast through Davies's letter, to fulfil which seemed to make me a willing tool where my chosen rôle was that of an embittered exile, or at least a condescending ally. However, I faced the commissions manfully, after leaving the office.

* See Map A.

At Lancaster's I inquired for his gun, was received coolly, and had to pay a heavy bill, which it seemed to have incurred, before it was handed over. Having ordered the gun and No. 4's to be sent to my chambers, I bought the Raven mixture with that peculiar sense of injury which the prospect of smuggling in another's behalf always entails; and wondered where in the world Carey and Neilson's was, a firm which Davies spoke of as though it were as well known as the Bank of England or the Stores, instead of specialising in "rigging-screws," whatever they might be. They sounded important, though, and it would be only polite to unearth them. I connected them with the "few repairs," and awoke new misgivings. At the Stores I asked for a No. 3 Rippingille stove, and was confronted with a formidable and hideous piece of ironmongery, which burned petroleum in two capacious tanks, horribly prophetic of a smell of warm oil. I paid for this miserably, convinced of its grim efficiency, but speculating as to the domestic conditions which caused it to be sent for as an afterthought by telegram. I also asked about rigging-screws in the yachting department, but learnt that they were not kept in stock; that Carey and Neilson's would certainly have them, and that their shop was in the Minories, in the far east, meaning a journey nearly as long as to Flensburg, and twice as tiresome. They would be shut by the time I got there, so after this exhausting round of duty I went home in a cab, omitted dressing for dinner (an epoch in itself), ordered a chop p from the basement kitchen, and spent the rest of the vening packing and writing, with the methodical gloom f a man setting his affairs in order for the last time.

The last of those airless nights passed. The aston-hed Withers saw me breakfasting at eight, and at 30 I was vacantly examining rigging-screws with what its were left me after a sulphurous ride in the Under-round to Aldgate. I laid great stress on the ⅜'s, and ne galvanism, and took them in trust, ignorant as to neir functions. For the eleven-shilling oilskins I was eferred to a villainous den in a back street, which the nopman said they always recommended, and where a irty and bejewelled Hebrew chaffered with me (begin-ng at 18*s.*) over two reeking orange slabs distantly esembling moieties of the human figure. Their odour ade me close prematurely for 14*s.*, and I hurried back or I was due there at eleven) to my office with my vo disreputable brown-paper parcels, one of which made self so noticeable in the close official air that Carter ttentively asked if I would like to have it sent to my nambers, and K— was inquisitive to bluntness about and my movements. But I did not care to enlighten —, whose comments I knew would be provokingly avious or wounding to my pride in some way.

I remembered, later on, the prismatic compass, and ired to the Minories to have one sent at once, feeling ther relieved that I was not present there to be cross-xamined as to size and make. The reply was, "Not ocked; try surveying-instrument maker"—a reply oth puzzling and reassuring, for Davies's request for a mpass had given me more uneasiness than anything, hile, to find that what he wanted turned out to be a urveying-instrument, was a no less perplexing discovery. That day I made my last précis and handed over my schedules—Procrustean beds, where unwilling facts were stretched and tortured—and said good-bye to my temporary chief, genial and lenient M—, who wished me a jolly holiday with all sincerity.

At seven I was watching a cab packed with my personal luggage and the collection of unwieldy and incongruous packages that my shopping had drawn down on me. Two deviations after that wretched prismatic compass—which I obtained in the end second-hand, faute de mieux, near Victoria, at one of those showy shops which look like jewellers' and are really pawnbrokers'—nearly caused me to miss my train. But at 8.30 I had shaken off the dust of London from my feet, and at 10.30 I was, as I have announced, pacing the deck of a Flushing steamer, adrift on this fatuous holiday in the far Baltic.

An air from the west, cooled by a midday thunderstorm, followed the steamer as she slid through the calm channels of the Thames estuary, passed the cordon of scintillating lightships that watch over the sea-roads to the imperial city like pickets round a sleeping army, and slipped out into the dark spaces of the North Sea. Stars were bright, summer scents from the Kent cliffs mingled coyly with vulgar steamer-smells; the summer weather held immutably. Nature, for her part, seemed resolved to be no party to my penance, but to be imperturbably bent on shedding mild ridicule over my wrongs. An irresistible sense of peace and detachment, combined with that delicious physical awakening that pulses through the nerve-sick townsman when city airs and bald routine are left behind him, combined to provide me, however thankless a subject, with a solid background of resignation. Stowing this safely away, I could calculate my intentions with cold egotism. If the weather held I might pass a not intolerable fortnight with Davies. When it broke up, as it was sure to, I could easily excuse myself from the pursuit of the problematical ducks; the wintry logic of facts would, in any case, decide him to lay up his yacht, for he could scarcely think of sailing home at such a season. I could then take a chance lying ready of spending a few weeks in Dresden or elsewhere. I settled this programme comfortably and then turned in.

From Flushing eastward to Hamburg, then northward to Flensburg, I cut short the next day's sultry story. Past dyke and windmill and still canals, on to blazing stubbles and roaring towns; at the last, after dusk, through a quiet level region where the train pottered from one lazy little station to another, and at ten o'clock I found myself, stiff and stuffy, on the platform at Flensburg, exchanging greetings with Davies.

"It's awfully good of you to come."

"Not at all; it's very good of you to ask me."

We were both of us ill at ease. Even in the dim gaslight he clashed on my notions of a yachtsman—no cool white ducks or neat blue serge; and where was the snowy crowned yachting cap, that precious charm that so easily converts a landsman into a dashing mariner? Conscious that this impressive uniform, in high perfection, was lying ready in my portmanteau, I felt oddly guilty. He wore an old Norfolk jacket, muddy brown shoes, grey flannel trousers (or had they been white?), and an ordinary tweed cap. The hand he gave me was horny, and appeared to be stained with paint; the other one, which carried a parcel, had a bandage on it which would have borne renewal. There was an instant of mutual inspection. I thought he gave me a shy, hurried scrutiny as though to test past conjectures, with something of anxiety in it, and perhaps (save the mark !) a tinge of admiration. The face was familiar, and yet not familiar; the pleasant blue eyes, open, clean-cut features, unintellectual forehead were the same; so were the brisk and impulsive movements; there was some change; but the moment of awkward hesitation was over and the light was bad; and, while strolling down the platform for my luggage, we chatted with constraint about trivial things.

"By the way," he suddenly said, laughing, "I'm afraid I'm not fit to be seen; but it's so late it doesn't matter. I've been painting hard all day, and just got it finished. I only hope we shall have some wind to-morrow—it's been hopelessly calm lately. I say, you've brought a good deal of stuff," he concluded, as my belongings began to collect.

Here was a reward for my submissive exertions in the far east !

"You gave me a good many commissions ! "

"Oh, I didn't mean those things," he said, absently. "Thanks for bringing them, by the way. That's the stove, I suppose; cartridges, this one, by the weight. You got the rigging-screws all right, I hope? They're not really necessary, of course" (I nodded vacantly, and felt a little hurt); "but they're simpler than lanyards, and you can't get them here. It's that portmanteau," he said, slowly, measuring it with a doubtful eye. "Never mind ! we'll try. You couldn't do with the Gladstone only, I suppose? You see, the dinghy—h'm, and there's the hatchway, too"—he was lost in thought.

Anyhow, we'll try. I'm afraid there are no cabs; ut it's quite near, and the porter'll help."

Sickening forebodings crept over me, while Davies houldered my Gladstone and clutched at the parcels.

"Aren't your men here?" I asked, faintly.

"Men?" He looked confused. "Oh, perhaps I ught to have told you, I never have any paid hands; 's quite a small boat, you know—I hope you didn't xpect luxury. I've managed her single-handed for some me. A man would be no use, and a horrible nuisance." e revealed these appalling truths with a cheerful ssurance, which did nothing to hide a naïve apprehen- on of their effect on me. There was a check in our obilisation.

"It's rather late to go on board, isn't it?" I said, a wooden voice. Someone was turning out the gas- hts, and the porter yawned ostentatiously. "I think d rather sleep at an hotel to-night." A strained pause.

"Oh, of course you can do that, if you like," said avies, in transparent distress of mind. "But it seems rdly worth while to cart this stuff all the way to an tel (I believe they're all on the other side of the har- ur), and back again to the boat to-morrow. She's ite comfortable, and you're sure to sleep well, as u're tired."

"We can leave the things here," I argued feebly, and walk over with my bag."

"Oh, I shall have to go aboard anyhow," he rejoined; I never sleep on shore."

He seemed to be clinging timidly, but desperately, to me diplomatic end. A stony despair was invading me d paralysing resistance. Better face the worst and done with it.

"Come on," I said, grimly.

Heavily loaded, we stumbled over railway lines and rubble heaps, and came on the harbour. Davies led the way to a stairway, whose weedy steps disappeared below in gloom.

"If you'll get into the dinghy," he said, all briskness now, "I'll pass the things down."

I descended gingerly, holding as a guide a sodden painter which ended in a small boat, and conscious that I was collecting slime on cuffs and trousers.

"Hold up!" shouted Davies, cheerfully, as I sat down suddenly near the bottom, with one foot in the water.

I climbed wretchedly into the dinghy and awaited events.

"Now float her up close under the quay wall, and make fast to the ring down there," came down from above, followed by the slack of the sodden painter which knocked my cap off as it fell. "All fast? Any knot'll do," I heard, as I grappled with this loathsome task, and then a big, dark object loomed overhead and was lowered into the dinghy. It was my portmanteau, and placed athwart, exactly filled all the space amidships. "Does it fit?" was the anxious inquiry from aloft.

"Beautifully."

"Capital!"

Scratching at the greasy wall to keep the dinghy close to it, I received in succession our stores, and stowed the cargo as best I could, while the dinghy sank lower and lower in the water, and its precarious superstructure grew higher.

"Catch!" was the final direction from above, and a damp soft parcel hit me in the chest. "Be careful of that, it's meat. Now back to the stairs!"

I painfully acquiesced, and Davies appeared.

"It's a bit of a load, and she's rather deep; but I think we shall manage," he reflected. "You sit right aft, and I'll row."

I was too far gone for curiosity as to how this monstrous pyramid was to be rowed, or even for surmises as to its foundering by the way. I crawled to my appointed seat, and Davies extricated the buried sculls by a series of tugs, which shook the whole structure, and made us roll alarmingly. How he stowed himself into rowing posture I have not the least idea, but eventually we were moving sluggishly out into the open water. his head just visible in the bows. We had started from what appeared to be the head of a narrow loch, and were leaving behind us the lights of a big town. A long frontage of lamp-lit quays was on our left, with here and there the vague hull of a steamer alongside. We passed the last of the lights and came out into a broader stretch of water, when a light breeze was blowing and dark hills could be seen on either shore.

"I'm lying a little way down the fiord, you see," said Davies. "I hate to be too near a town, and I found a carpenter handy here—— There she is! I wonder how you'll like her!"

I roused myself. We were entering a little cove encircled by trees, and approaching a light which flickered on the rigging of a small vessel, whose outline gradually defined itself.

"Keep her off," said Davies, as we drew alongside.

In a moment he had jumped on deck, tied the painter, and was round at my end.

"You hand them up," he ordered, "and I'll take them."

It was a laborious task, with the one relief that it was not far to hand them—a doubtful compensation, for other reasons distantly shaping themselves. When the stack was transferred to the deck I followed it, tripping over the flabby meat parcel, which was already showing ghastly signs of disintegration under the dew. Hazily there floated through my mind my last embarkation on a yacht; my faultless attire, the trim gig and obsequious sailors, the accommodation ladder flashing with varnish and brass in the August sun; the orderly, snowy decks and basket chairs under the awning aft. What a contrast with this sordid midnight scramble, over damp meat and littered packing-cases! The bitterest touch of all was a growing sense of inferiority and ignorance which I had never before been allowed to feel in my experience of yachts.

Davies awoke from another reverie over my portmanteau to say, cheerily: "I'll just show you round down below first, and then we'll stow things away and get to bed."

He dived down a companion ladder, and I followed cautiously. A complex odour of paraffin, past cookery, tobacco, and tar saluted my nostrils.

"Mind your head," said Davies, striking a match and lighting a candle, while I groped into the cabin. "You'd better sit down; it's easier to look round."

There might well have been sarcasm in this piece of advice, for I must have cut a ridiculous figure, peering awkwardly and suspiciously round, with shoulders and head bent to avoid the ceiling, which seemed in the half-light to be even nearer the floor than it was.

"You see," were Davies's reassuring words, "there's plenty of room to sit upright" (which was strictly true;

t I am not very tall, and he is short). "Some people ake a point of head-room, but I never mind much out it. That's the centre-board case," he explained, , in stretching my legs out, my knee came into contact th a sharp edge.

I had not seen this devilish obstruction, as it was hid- n beneath the table, which indeed rested on it at one d. It appeared to be a long, low triangle, running ngthways with the boat and dividing the naturally nited space into two.

"You see, she's a flat-bottomed boat, drawing very tle water without the plate; that's why there's so tle head-room. For deep water you lower the plate; so, one way or another, you can go practically anywhere."

I was not nautical enough to draw any very definite nclusions from this, but what I did draw were not omising. The latter sentences were spoken from the recastle, whither Davies had crept through a low ding door, like that of a rabbit-hutch, and was already sy with a kettle over a stove which I made out to be battered and disreputable twin brother of the No. 3 ippingille.

"It'll be boiling soon," he remarked, "and we'll have me grog."

My eyes were used to the light now, and I took in the st of my surroundings, which may be very simply scribed. Two long cushion-covered seats flanked the bin, bounded at the after end by cupboards, one of hich was cut low to form a sort of miniature sideboard, th glasses hung in a rack above it. The deck over- ad was very low at each side but rose shoulder high r a space in the middle, where a "coach-house roof" th a skylight gave additional cabin space. Just outside the door was a fold-up washing-stand. On either wall were long net-racks holding a medley of flags, charts, caps, cigar-boxes, hanks of yarn, and such like. Across the forward bulkhead was a bookshelf crammed to overflowing with volumes of all sizes, many upside down and some coverless. Below this were a pipe-rack, an aneroid, and a clock with a hearty tick. All the woodwork was painted white, and to a less jaundiced eye than mine the interior might have had an enticing look of snugness. Some Kodak prints were nailed roughly on the after bulkhead, and just over the doorway was the photograph of a young girl.

"That's my sister," said Davies, who had emerged and saw me looking at it. "Now, let's get the stuff down." He ran up the ladder, and soon my portmanteau blackened the hatchway, and a great straining and squeezing began. "I was afraid it was too big," came down; "I'm sorry, but you'll have to unpack on deck—we may be able to squash it down when it's empty."

Then the wearisome tail of packages began to form a fresh stack in the cramped space at my feet, and my back ached with stooping and moiling in unfamiliar places. Davies came down, and with unconcealed pride introduced me to the sleeping cabin (he called the other one "the saloon"). Another candle was lit and showed two short and narrow berths with blankets, but no sign of sheets; beneath these were drawers, one set of which Davies made me master of, evidently thinking them a princely allowance of space for my wardrobe.

"You can chuck your things down the skylight on to your berth as you unpack them," he remarked. "By the way, I doubt if there's room for all you've got. I suppose you couldn't manage——"

"No, I couldn't," I said, shortly.

The absurdity of argument struck me; two men, doubled up like monkeys, cannot argue.

"If you'll go out I shall be able to get out too," I added. He seemed miserable at this ghost of an altercation, but I pushed past mounted the ladder and in the expiring moonlight unstrapped that accursed portmanteau, and, brimming over with irritation, groped among its contents, sorting some into the skylight with the same feeling that nothing mattered much now, and it was best to be done with it; repacking the rest with guilty stealth ere Davies should discover their character, and strapping up the whole again. Then I sat down upon my white elephant and shivered, for the chill of autumn was in the air. It suddenly struck me that if it had been raining things might have been worse still. The notion made me look round. The little cove was as still as glass; stars above and stars below; a few white cottages glimmering at one point on the shore; to the west the lights of Flensburg; to the east the fiord broadening into unknown gloom. From Davies toiling below there were muffled sounds of wrenching, pushing, and hammering, punctuated occasionally by a heavy splash as something shot up from the hatchway and fell into the water.

How it came about I do not know. Whether it was something pathetic in the look I had last seen on his face—a look which I associated for no reason whatever with his bandaged hand; whether it was one of those instants of clear vision in which our separate selves are often divided, the baser from the better, and I saw my petty egotism in contrast with a simple generous nature; whether it was an impalpable air of mystery which pervaded the whole enterprise and refused to be dissipated by its most mortifying and vulgarising incidents—a mystery dimly connected with my companion's obvious consciousness of having misled me into joining him; whether it was only the stars and the cool air rousing atrophied instincts of youth and spirits; probably, indeed, it was all these influences, cemented into strength by a ruthless sense of humour which whispered that I was in danger of making a mere commonplace fool of myself in spite of all my laboured calculations; but whatever it was, in a flash my mood changed. The crown of martyrdom disappeared, the wounded vanity healed; that precious fund of fictitious resignation drained away, but left no void. There was left a fashionable and dishevelled young man sitting in the dew and in the dark on a ridiculous portmanteau which dwarfed the yacht that was to carry it; a youth acutely sensible of ignorance in a strange and strenuous atmosphere; still feeling sore and victimised; but withal sanely ashamed and sanely resolved to enjoy himself. I anticipate; for though the change was radical its full growth was slow. But in any case it was here and now that it took its birth.

"Grog's ready!" came from below. Bunching myself for the descent I found to my astonishment that all trace of litter had miraculously vanished, and a cosy neatness reigned. Glasses and lemons were on the table, and a fragrant smell of punch had deadened previous odours. I showed little emotion at these amenities, but enough to give intense relief to Davies, who delightedly showed me his devices for storage, praising the "roominess" of his floating den. "There's your stove, you see," he ended; "I've chucked the old one overboard."

: was a weakness of his, I should say here, to rejoice in rowing things overboard on the flimsiest pretexts. I terwards suspected that the new stove had not been really necessary" any more than the rigging-screws, ut was an excuse for gratifying this curious taste.

We smoked and chatted for a little, and then came ie problem of going to bed. After much bumping of nuckles and head, and many giddy writhings, I mastered , and lay between the rough blankets. Davies, moving viftly and deftly, was soon in his.

"It's quite comfortable, isn't it?" he said, as he blew ut the light from where he lay, with an accuracy which ust have been the fruit of long practice.

I felt prickly all over, and there was a damp patch n the pillow, which was soon explained by a heavy rop of moisture falling on my forehead.

"I suppose the deck's not leaking?" I said, as mildly s I could.

"I'm awfully sorry," said Davies, earnestly, tumbling ut of his bunk. "It must be the heavy dew. I did lot of caulking yesterday, but I suppose I missed that lace. I'll run up and square it with an oilskin."

"What's wrong with your hand?" I asked, sleepily, n his return, for gratitude reminded me of that bandage.

"Nothing much; I strained it the other day," was ie reply; and then the seemingly inconsequent re-ark: "I'm glad you brought that prismatic compass.
's not really necessary, of course; but" (muffled by ankets) "it may come in useful."

CHAPTER III

DAVIES

I DOZED but fitfully, with a fretful sense of sore elbows and neck and many a draughty hiatus among the blankets. It was broad daylight before I had reached the stage of torpor in which such slumber merges. That was finally broken by the descent through the skylight of a torrent of water. I started up, bumped my head hard against the decks, and blinked leaden-eyed upwards.

"Sorry! I'm scrubbing decks. Come up and bathe. Slept well?" I heard a voice saying from aloft.

"Fairly well," I growled, stepping out into a pool of water on the oilcloth. Thence I stumbled up the ladder, dived overboard, and buried bad dreams, stiffness, frowsiness, and tormented nerves in the loveliest fiord of the lovely Baltic. A short and furious swim and I was back again, searching for a means of ascent up the smooth black side, which, low as it was, was slippery and unsympathetic. Davies, in a loose canvas shirt, with the sleeves tucked up, and flannels rolled up to the knee, hung over me with a rope's end, and chatted unconcernedly about the easiness of the job when you know how, adjuring me to mind the paint, and talking about an accommodation ladder he had once had, but had thrown overboard because it was so horribly in the way. When I arrived, my knees and elbows were picked out in black paint, to his consternation. Nevertheless, as I plied the towel, I knew that I had left in those limpid depths yet another crust of discontent and self-conceit.

As I dressed into flannels and blazer, I looked round

e deck, and with an unskilled and doubtful eye took all that the darkness had hitherto hidden. She emed very small (in point of fact she was seven tons), mething over thirty feet in length and nine in beam, size very suitable to week-ends in the Solent, for such liked that sort of thing; but that she should have me from Dover to the Baltic suggested a world of ysical endeavour of which I had never dreamed. I ssed to the æsthetic side. Smartness and beauty were sential to yachts, in my mind, but with the best solves to be pleased I found little encouragement here. ne hull seemed too low, and the mainmast too high; e cabin roof looked clumsy, and the skylights sad- ned the eye with dull iron and plebeian graining. What ass there was, on the tiller-head and elsewhere, was rnished with sickly green. The decks had none of at creamy purity which Cowes expects, but were ugh and grey, and showed tarry exhalations round the ams and rusty stains near the bows. The ropes and gging were in mourning when contrasted with the licate buff manilla so satisfying to the artistic eye as en against the blue of a June sky at Southsea. Nor as the whole effect bettered by many signs of recent fitting. An impression of paint, varnish, and car- ntry was in the air; a gaudy new burgee fluttered oft; there seemed to be a new rope or two, especially und the diminutive mizzen-mast, which itself looked together new. But all this only emphasised the gen- al plainness, reminding one of a respectable woman of e working-classes trying to dress above her station, d soon likely to give it up.

That the ensemble was businesslike and solid even my ntrained eye could see. Many of the deck fittings seemed disproportionately substantial. The anchor-chain looked contemptuous of its charge; the binnacle with its compass was of a size and prominence almost comically impressive, and was, moreover, the only piece of brass which was burnished and showed traces of reverent care. Two huge coils of stout and dingy warp lay just abaft the mainmast, and summed up the weather-beaten aspect of the little ship. I should add here that in the distant past she had been a lifeboat, and had been clumsily converted into a yacht by the addition of a counter, deck, and the necessary spars. She was built, as all lifeboats are, diagonally, of two skins of teak, and thus had immense strength, though, in the matter of looks, all a hybrid's failings.

Hunger and "Tea's made!" from below brought me down to the cabin, where I found breakfast laid out on the table over the centre-board case, with Davies earnestly presiding, rather flushed as to the face, and sooty as to the fingers. There was a slight shortage of plate and crockery, but I praised the bacon and could do so truthfully, for its crisp and steaming shavings would have put to shame the efforts of my London cook. Indeed, I should have enjoyed the meal heartily were it not for the lowness of the sofa and table, causing a curvature of the body which made swallowing a more lengthy process than usual, and induced a periodical yearning to get up and stretch—a relief which spelt disaster to the skull. I noticed, too, that Davies spoke with a zest, sinister to me, of the delights of white bread and fresh milk, which he seemed to consider unusual luxuries, though suitable to an inaugural banquet in honour of a fastidious stranger. "One can't be always going on shore," he said, when I showed a discreet interest in ese things. "I lived for ten days on a big rye loaf er in the Frisian Islands."

"And it died hard, I suppose?"

"Very hard, but" (gravely) "quite good. After that taught myself to make rolls; had no baking powder first, so used Eno's fruit salt, but they wouldn't rise uch with that. As for milk, condensed is—I hope you n't mind it?"

I changed the subject, and asked about his plans.

"Let's get under way at once," he said, "and sail wn the fiord." I tried for something more specific, t he was gone, and his voice drowned in the fo'c'sle the clatter and swish of washing up. Thenceforward ents moved with bewildering rapidity. Humbly de-rous of being useful I joined him on deck, only to find at he scarcely noticed me, save as a new and unex-cted obstacle in his round of activity. He was every-here at once—heaving in chain, hooking on halyards, uling ropes; while my part became that of the clown ho does things after they are already done, for my owledge of a yacht was of that floating and inaccurate nd which is useless in practice. Soon the anchor was (a great rusty monster it was!), the sails set, and avies was darting swiftly to and fro between the tiller d jib-sheets, while the Dulcibella bowed a lingering rewell to the shore and headed for the open fiord.
ratic puffs from the high land behind made her progress norous at first, but soon the fair-way was reached and true breeze from Flensburg and the west took her in friendly grip. Steadily she rustled down the calm ue highway whose soft beauty was the introduction a passage in my life, short, but pregnant with moulding rce, through stress and strain, for me and others.

Davies was gradually resuming his natural self, with abstracted intervals, in which he lashed the helm to finger a distant rope, with such speed that the movements seemed simultaneous. Once he vanished, only to reappear in an instant with a chart, which he studied while steering, with a success that its reluctant folds seemed to render impossible. Waiting respectfully for his revival I had full time to look about. The fiord here was about a mile broad. From the shore we had left the hills rose steeply, but with no rugged grandeur the outlines were soft; there were green spaces and rich woods on the lower slopes; a little white town was opening up in one place, and scattered farms dotted the prospect. The other shore, which I could just see framed between the gunwale and the mainsail, as I sat leaning against the hatchway, and sadly missing a deck chair, was lower and lonelier, though prosperous and pleasing to the eye. Spacious pastures led up by slow degrees to ordered clusters of wood, which hinted at the presence of some great manor house. Behind us, Flensburg was settling into haze. Ahead, the scene was shut in by the contours of hills, some clear, some dreamy and distant. Lastly, a single glimpse of water shining between the folds of hill far away hinted at spaces of distant sea of which this was but a secluded inlet. Everywhere was that peculiar charm engendered by the association of quiet pastoral country and a homely human atmosphere with a branch of the great ocean that bathes all the shores of our globe.

There was another charm in the scene, due to the way in which I was viewing it—not as a pampered passenger on a "fine steam yacht," or even on "a powerful modern schooner," as the yacht agents advertise, but from the ck of a scrubby little craft of doubtful build and dis-essing plainness, which yet had smelt her persistent ay to this distant fiord through I knew not what of fficulty and danger, with no apparent motive in her ngle occupant, who talked as vaguely and uncon-rnedly about his adventurous cruise as though it were a protracted afternoon on Southampton Water.

I glanced round at Davies. He had dropped the chart d was sitting, or rather half lying, on the deck with e bronzed arm over the tiller, gazing fixedly ahead, th just an occasional glance around and aloft. He ll seemed absorbed in himself, and for a moment or o I studied his face with an attention I had never, nce I had known him, given it. I had always thought commonplace, as I had thought him commonplace, so r as I had thought at all about either. It had always ther irritated me by an excess of candour and boyishss. These qualities it had kept, but the scales were lling from my eyes, and I saw others. I saw strength obstinacy and courage to recklessness, in the firm es of the chin; an older and deeper look in the eyes.
hose odd transitions from bright mobility to detached rnestness, which had partly amused and chiefly an-oyed me hitherto, seemed now to be lost in a sensitive serve, not cold or egotistic, but strangely winning from s paradoxical frankness. Sincerity was stamped on ery lineament. A deep misgiving stirred me that, ever as I thought myself, nicely perceptive of the right
d congenial men to know, I had made some big miskes—how many, I wondered? A relief, scarcely less ep because it was unconfessed, stole in on me with e suspicion that, little as I deserved it, the patient tes were offering me a golden chance of repairing at least one. And yet, I mused, the patient fates have crooked methods, besides a certain mischievous humour, for it was Davies who had asked me out—though now he scarcely seemed to need me—almost tricked me into coming out, for he might have known I was not suited to such a life; yet trickery and Davies sounded an odd conjuncture.

Probably it was the growing discomfort of my attitude which produced this backsliding. My night's rest and the "ascent from the bath" had, in fact, done little to prepare me for contact with sharp edges and hard surfaces. But Davies had suddenly come to himself, and with an "I say, are you comfortable? Have something to sit on?" jerked the helm a little to windward, felt it like a pulse for a moment, with a rapid look to windward, and dived below, whence he returned with a couple of cushions, which he threw to me. I felt perversely resentful of these luxuries, and asked:—

"Can't I be of any use?"

"Oh, don't you bother," he answered. "I expect you're tired. Aren't we having a splendid sail? That must be Ekken on the port bow," peering under the sail, "where the trees run in. I say, do you mind looking at the chart?" He tossed it over to me. I spread it out painfully, for it curled up like a watch-spring at the least slackening of pressure. I was not familiar with charts, and this sudden trust reposed in me, after a good deal of neglect, made me nervous.

"You see Flensburg, don't you?" he said. "That's where we are," dabbing with a long reach at an indefinite space on the crowded sheet. "Now which side of that buoy off the point do we pass?"

I had scarcely taken in which was land and which was water, much less the significance of the buoy, when he resumed :—

"Never mind; I'm pretty sure it's all deep water about here. I expect that marks the fair-way for steamers."

In a minute or two we were passing the buoy in question, on the wrong side I am pretty certain, for weeds and sand came suddenly into view below us with uncomfortable distinctness. But all Davies said was :—

"There's never any sea here, and the plate's not down," a dark utterance which I pondered doubtfully. "The best of these Schleswig waters," he went on, "is that a boat of this size can go almost anywhere. There's no navigation required. Why——" At this moment a faint scraping was felt, rather than heard, beneath us.

"Aren't we aground?" I asked, with great calmness.

"Oh, she'll blow over," he replied, wincing a little.

She "blew over," but the episode caused a little naïve vexation in Davies. I relate it as a good instance of one of his minor peculiarities. He was utterly without that didactic pedantry which yachting has a fatal tendency to engender in men who profess it. He had tossed me the chart without a thought that I was an ignoramus, to whom it would be Greek, and who would provide him with an admirable subject to drill and lecture, just as his neglect of me throughout the morning had been merely habitual and unconscious independence. In the second place, master of his métier, as I knew him afterwards to be, resourceful, skilful, and alert, he was liable to lapse into a certain amateurish vagueness, half irritating and half amusing. I think truly that both these peculiarities came from the same source, a hatred of any sort of affectation. To the same source I traced the fact that he and his yacht observed none of the superficial etiquette of yachts and yachtsmen, that she never, for instance, flew a national ensign, and he never wore a "yachting suit."

We rounded a low green point which I had scarcely noticed before.

"We must jibe," said Davies; "just take the helm, will you?" and, without waiting for my co-operation, he began hauling in the mainsheet with great vigour. I had rude notions of steering, but jibing is a delicate operation. No yachtsman will be surprised to hear that the boom saw its opportunity and swung over with a mighty crash, with the mainsheet entangled round me and the tiller.

"Jibed all standing," was his sorrowful comment. "You're not used to her yet. She's very quick on the helm."

"Where am I to steer for?" I asked, wildly.

"Oh, don't trouble, I'll take her now," he replied.

I felt it was time to make my position clear. "I'm an utter duffer at sailing," I began. "You'll have a lot to teach me, or one of these days I shall be wrecking you. You see, there's always been a crew——"

"Crew!"—with sovereign contempt—"why, the whole fun of the thing is to do everything oneself."

"Well, I've felt in the way the whole morning."

"I'm awfully sorry!" His dismay and repentance were comical. "Why, it's just the other way; you may be all the use in the world." He became absent.

We were following the inward trend of a small bay towards a cleft in the low shore.

"That's Ekken Sound," said Davies; "let's look into it," and a minute or two later we were drifting through a dainty little strait, with a peep of open water at the end of it. Cottages bordered either side, some overhanging the very water, some connecting with it by a rickety wooden staircase or a miniature landing-stage. Creepers and roses rioted over the walls and tiny porches. For a space on one side, a rude quay, with small smacks floating off it, spoke of some minute commercial interests; a very small tea-garden, with neglected-looking bowers and leaf-strewn tables, hinted at some equally minute tripping interest. A pervading hue of mingled bronze and rose came partly from the weather-mellowed woodwork of the cottages and stages, and partly from the creepers and the trees behind, where autumn's subtle fingers were already at work. Down this exquisite sea-lane we glided till it ended in a broad mere, where our sails, which had been shivering and complaining, filled into contented silence.

"Ready about!" said Davies, callously. "We must get out of this again." And round we swung.

"Why not anchor and stop here?" I protested; for a view of tantalising loveliness was unfolding itself.

"Oh, we've seen all there is to be seen, and we must take this breeze while we've got it." It was always torture to Davies to feel a good breeze running to waste while he was inactive at anchor or on shore. The "shore" to him was an inferior element, merely serving as a useful annexe to the water—a source of necessary supplies.

"Let's have lunch," he pursued, as we resumed our way down the fiord. A vision of iced drinks, tempting salads, white napery, and an attentive steward mocked me with past recollections.

"You'll find a tongue," said the voice of doom, "in the starboard sofa-locker; beer under the floor in the bilge. I'll see her round that buoy, if you wouldn't mind beginning." I obeyed with a bad grace, but the close air and cramped posture must have benumbed my faculties, for I opened the port-side locker, reached down, and grasped a sticky body, which turned out to be a pot of varnish. Recoiling wretchedly, I tried the opposite one, combating the embarrassing heel of the boat and the obstructive edges of the centre-board case. A medley of damp tins of varied sizes showed in the gloom, exuding a mouldy odour. Faded legends on dissolving paper, like the remnants of old posters on a disused hoarding, spoke of soups, curries, beefs, potted meats, and other hidden delicacies. I picked out a tongue, re-imprisoned the odour, and explored for beer. It was true, I supposed, that bilge didn't hurt it, as I tugged at the plank on my hands and knees, but I should have myself preferred a more accessible and less humid wine-cellar than the cavities among slimy ballast from which I dug the bottles. I regarded my hard-won and ill-favoured pledges of a meal with giddiness and discouragement.

"How are you getting on?" shouted Davies; "the tin-opener's hanging up on the bulkhead; the plates and knives are in the cupboard."

I doggedly pursued my functions. The plates and knives met me half-way, for, being on the weather side, and thus having a downward slant, its contents, when I slipped the latch, slid affectionately into my bosom, and overflowed with a clatter and jingle on to the floor.

"That often happens," I heard from above. "Never mind! There are no breakables. I'm coming down to help." And down he came, leaving the Dulcibella to her own devices.

"I think I'll go on deck," I said. "Why in the world couldn't you lunch comfortably at Ekken and save this infernal pandemonium of a picnic? Where's the yacht going to meanwhile? And how are we to lunch on that slanting table? I'm covered with varnish and mud, and ankle-deep in crockery. There goes the beer!"

"You shouldn't have stood it on the table with this list on," said Davies, with intense composure, "but it won't do any harm; it'll drain into the bilge" (ashes to ashes, dust to dust, I thought). "You go on deck now, and I'll finish getting ready." I regretted my explosion, though wrung from me under great provocation.

"Keep her straight on as she's going," said Davies, as I clambered up out of the chaos, brushing the dust off my trousers and varnishing the ladder with my hands. I unlashed the helm and kept her as she was going.

We had rounded a sharp bend in the fiord, and were sailing up a broad and straight reach which every moment disclosed new beauties, sights fair enough to be balm to the angriest spirit. A red-roofed hamlet was on our left, on the right an ivied ruin, close to the water, where some contemplative cattle stood knee-deep. The view ahead was a white strand which fringed both shores, and to it fell wooded slopes, interrupted here and there by low sandstone cliffs of warm red colouring, and now and again by a dingle with cracks of greensward.

I forgot petty squalors and enjoyed things—the coy tremble of the tiller and the backwash of air from the dingy mainsail, and, with a somewhat chastened rapture, the lunch which Davies brought up to me and solicitously watched me eat.

Later, as the wind sank to lazy airs, he became busy with a larger topsail and jib ; but I was content to doze away the afternoon, drenching brain and body in the sweet and novel foreign atmosphere, and dreamily watching the fringe of glen cliff and cool white sand as they passed ever more slowly by.

CHAPTER IV

RETROSPECT

"WAKE up!" I rubbed my eyes and wondered where I was; stretched myself painfully, too, for even the cushions had not given me a true bed of roses. It was dusk, and the yacht was stationary in glassy water, coloured by the last after-glow. A roofing of thin upper-cloud had spread over most of the sky, and a subtle smell of rain was in the air. We seemed to be in the middle of the fiord, whose shores looked distant and steep in the gathering darkness. Close ahead they faded away suddenly, and the sight lost itself in a grey void. The stillness was absolute.

"We can't get to Sonderburg to-night," said Davies.

"What's to be done then?" I asked, collecting my senses.

"Oh! we'll anchor anywhere here, we're just at the mouth of the fiord; I'll tow her inshore if you'll steer in that direction." He pointed vaguely at a blur of trees and cliff. Then he jumped into the dinghy, cast off the painter, and, after snatching at the slack of a rope, began towing the reluctant yacht by short jerks of the sculls. The menacing aspect of that grey void, combined with a natural preference for getting to some definite place at night, combined to depress my spirits afresh. In my sleep I had dreamt of Morven Lodge, of heather tea-parties after glorious slaughters of grouse, of salmon leaping in amber pools—and now—

"Just take a cast of the lead, will you?" came Davies's voice above the splash of the sculls.

"Where is it?" I shouted back.

"Never mind—we're close enough now; let—— Can you manage to let go the anchor?"

I hurried forward and picked impotently at the bonds of the sleeping monster. But Davies was aboard again, and stirred him with a deft touch or two, till he crashed into the water with a grinding of chain.

"We shall do well here," said he.

"Isn't this rather an open anchorage?" I suggested.

"It's only open from that quarter," he replied. "If it comes on to blow from there we shall have to clear out; but I think it's only rain. Let's stow the sails."

Another whirlwind of activity, in which I joined as effectively as I could, oppressed by the prospect of having to "clear out"—who knows whither?—at midnight. But Davies's sang froid was infectious, I suppose, and the little den below, bright-lit and soon fragrant with cookery, pleaded insistently for affection. Yachting in this singular style was hungry work, I found. Steak tastes none the worse for having been wrapped in newspaper, and the slight traces of the day's news disappear with frying in onions and potato-chips. Davies was indeed on his mettle for this, his first dinner to his guest; for he produced with stealthy pride, not from the dishonoured grave of the beer, but from some more hallowed recess, a bottle of German champagne, from which we drank success to the Dulcibella.

"I wish you would tell me all about your cruise from England," I asked. "You must have had some exciting adventures. Here are the charts; let's go over them."

"We must wash up first," he replied, and I was tactfully introduced to one of his very few "standing orders," that tobacco should not burn, nor post-prandial chat begin, until that distasteful process had ended. "It would never get done otherwise," he sagely opined. But when we were finally settled with cigars, a variety of which, culled from many ports—German, Dutch, and Belgian—Davies kept in a battered old box in the net-rack, the promised talk hung fire.

"I'm no good at description," he complained; "and there's really very little to tell. We left Dover—Morrison and I—on August 6th; made a good passage to Ostend."

"You had some fun there, I suppose?" I put in, thinking of—well, of Ostend in August.

"Fun! A filthy hole I call it; we had to stop a couple of days, as we fouled a buoy coming in and carried away the bobstay; we lay in a dirty little tidal dock, and there was nothing to do on shore."

"Well, what next?"

"We had a splendid sail to the East Scheldt, but then, like fools, decided to go through Holland by canal and river. It was good fun enough navigating the estuary—the tides and banks there are appalling—but further inland it was a wretched business, nothing but paying lock-dues, bumping against schuyts, and towing down stinking canals. Never a peaceful night like this—always moored by some quay or tow-path, with people passing and boys. Heavens! shall I ever forget those boys! A perfect murrain of them infests Holland; they seem to have nothing in the world to do but throw stones and mud at foreign yachts."

"They want a Herod, with some statesmanlike views on infanticide."

"By Jove! yes; but the fact is that you want a crew for that pottering inland work; they can smack the boys and keep an eye on the sculls. A boat like this should stick to the sea, or out-of-the-way places on the coast. Well, after Amsterdam."

"You've skipped a good deal, haven't you?" I interrupted.

"Oh! have I? Well, let me see, we went by Dordrecht to Rotterdam; nothing to see there, and swarms of tugs buzzing about and shaving one's bows every second. On by the Vecht river to Amsterdam, and thence—Lord, what a relief it was!—out into the North Sea again. The weather had been still and steamy; but it broke up finely now, and we had a rattling three-reef sail to the Zuyder Zee."

He reached up to the bookshelf for what looked like an ancient ledger, and turned over the leaves.

"Is that your log?" I asked. "I should like to have a look at it."

"Oh! you'd find it dull reading—if you could read it at all; it's just short notes about winds and bearings, and so on." He was turning some leaves over rapidly. 'Now, why don't you keep a log of what we do? I can't describe things, and you can."

"I've half a mind to try," I said.

"We want another chart now," and he pulled down a second yet more stained and frayed than the first. 'We had a splendid time then exploring the Zuyder Zee, its northern part at least, and round those islands which bound it on the north. Those are the Frisian Islands, and they stretch for 120 miles or so eastward. You see, the first two of them, Texel and Vlieland, shut in the Zuyder Zee, and the rest border the Dutch and German coasts." *

"What's all this?" I said, running my finger over some dotted patches which covered much of the chart. The latter was becoming unintelligible; clean-cut coasts and neat regiments of little figures had given place to a confusion of winding and intersecting lines and bald spaces.

"All sand," said Davies, enthusiastically. "You can't think what a splendid sailing-ground it is. You can explore for days without seeing a soul. These are the channels, you see; they're very badly charted. This chart was almost useless, but it made it all the more fun. No towns or harbours, just a village or two on the islands, if you wanted stores."

"They look rather desolate," I said.

"Desolate's no word for it; they're really only gigantic sandbanks themselves."

"Wasn't all this rather dangerous?" I asked.

"Not a bit: you see, that's where our shallow draught and flat bottom came in—we could go anywhere, and it didn't matter running aground—she's perfect for that sort of work: and she doesn't really look bad either, does she?" he asked, rather wistfully. I suppose I hesitated, for he said, abruptly:—

"Anyway, I don't go in for looks."

He had leaned back, and I detected traces of incipient absent-mindedness. His cigar, which he had lately been lighting and relighting feverishly—a habit of his when excited—seemed now to have expired for good.

* See Map A.

"About running aground," I persisted; "surely that's apt to be dangerous?"

He sat up and felt round for a match.

"Not the least, if you know where you can run risks and where you can't; anyway, you can't possibly help it. That chart may look simple to you"—("simple!" I thought)—"but at half flood all those banks are covered; the islands and coasts are scarcely visible, they are so low, and everything looks the same." This graphic description of a "splendid cruising-ground" took away my breath. "Of course there is risk sometimes—choosing an anchorage requires care. You can generally get a nice berth under the lee of a bank, but the tides run strong in the channels, and if there's a gale blowing——"

"Didn't you ever take a pilot?" I interrupted.

"Pilot? Why, the whole point of the thing"—he stopped short—"I did take one once, later on," he resumed, with an odd smile, which faded at once.

"Well?" I urged, for I saw a reverie was coming.

"Oh! he ran me ashore, of course. Served me right. I wonder what the weather's doing"; he rose, glanced at the aneroid, the clock, and the half-closed skylight with a curious circular movement, and went a step or two up the companion-ladder, where he remained for several minutes with head and shoulders in the open air.

There was no sound of wind outside, but the Dulcibella had begun to move in her sleep, as it were, rolling drowsily to some faint send of the sea, with an occasional short jump, like the start of an uneasy dreamer.

"What does it look like?" I called from my sofa. I had to repeat the question.

"Rain coming," said Davies, returning, "and possibly wind; but we're safe enough here. It's coming from the sou'-west; shall we turn in?"

"We haven't finished your cruise yet," I said. "Light a pipe and tell me the rest."

"All right," he agreed, with more readiness than I expected.

"After Terschelling *—here it is, the third island from the west—I pottered along eastward."

"I?"

"Oh! I forgot. Morrison had to leave me there. I missed him badly, but I hoped at that time to get —— to join me. I could manage all right single-handed, but for that sort of work two are much better than one. The plate's beastly heavy: in fact I had to give up using it for fear of a smash."

"After Terschelling?" I jogged his memory.

"Well, I followed the Dutch islands, Ameland, Schiermonnikoog, Rottum (outlandish names, aren't they?), sometimes outside them, sometimes inside. It was a bit lonely, but grand sport and very interesting. The charts were shocking, but I worried out most of the channels."

"I suppose those waters are only used by small local craft?" I put in; "that would account for inaccuracies." Did Davies think that Admiralties had time to waste on smoothing the road for such quixotic little craft as his, in all its inquisitive ramblings? But he fired up.

"That's all very well," he said, "but think what folly it is. However that's a long story, and will bore you. To cut matters short, for we ought to be turning in, I got to Borkum—that's the first of the German islands." He pointed at a round bare lozenge lying in the midst of a welter of sandbanks. "Rottum—this queer little one—it has only one house on it—is the most easterly Dutch island, and the mainland of Holland ends here, opposite it, at the Ems River"—indicating a dismal cavity in the coast, sown with names suggestive of mud, and wrecks, and dreariness.

* See Map A.

"What date was this?" I asked.

"About the ninth of this month."

"Why, that's only a fortnight before you wired to me! You were pretty quick getting to Flensburg. Wait a bit, we want another chart. Is this the next?"

"Yes; but we scarcely need it. I only went a little way further on—to Norderney, in fact, the third German island—then I decided to go straight for the Baltic. I had always had an idea of getting there, as Knight did in the Falcon. So I made a passage of it to the Eider River, there on the West Schleswig coast, took the river and canal through to Kiel on the Baltic, and from there made another passage up north to Flensburg. I was a week there, and then you came, and here we are. And now let's turn in. We'll have a fine sail to-morrow!" He ended with rather forced vivacity, and briskly rolled up the chart. The reluctance he had shown from the first to talk about his cruise had been for a brief space forgotten in his enthusiasm about a portion of it, but had returned markedly in this bald conclusion. I felt sure that there was more in it than mere disinclination to spin nautical yarns in the "hardy Corinthian" style, which can be so offensive in amateur yachtsmen; and I thought I guessed the explanation. His voyage single-handed to the Baltic from the Frisian Islands had been a foolhardy enterprise, with perilous incidents, which, rather than make light of, he would not refer to at all.

Probably he was ashamed of his recklessness and wished to ignore it with me, an inexperienced acquaintance not yet enamoured of the Dulcibella's way of life, whom both courtesy and interest demanded that he should inspire with confidence. I liked him all the better as I came to this conclusion, but I was tempted to persist a little.

"I slept the whole afternoon," I said; "and, to tell the truth, I rather dread the idea of going to bed, it's so tiring. Look here, you've rushed over that last part like an express train. That passage to the Schleswig coast—the Eider River, did you say?—was a longish one, wasn't it?"

"Well, you see what it was; about seventy miles, I suppose, direct." He spoke low, bending down to sweep up some cigar ashes on the floor.

"Direct?" I insinuated. "Then you put in somewhere?"

"I stopped once, anchored for the night; oh, that's nothing of a sail with a fair wind. By Jove! I've forgotten to caulk that seam over your bunk, and it's going to rain. I must do it now. You turn in."

He disappeared. My curiosity, never very consuming, was banished by concern as to the open seam; for the prospect of a big drop, remorseless and regular as Fate, falling on my forehead throughout the night, as in the torture-chamber of the Inquisition, was alarming enough to recall me wholly to the immediate future. So I went to bed, finding on the whole that I had made progress in the exercise, though still far from being the trained contortionist that the occasion called for. Hammering ceased, and Davies reappeared just as I was stretched on the rack—tucked up in my bunk, I mean.

"I say," he said, when he was settled in his, and darkness reigned, "do you think you'll like this sort of thing?"

"If there are many places about here as beautiful as this," I replied, "I think I shall. But I should like to land now and then and have a walk. Of course, a great deal depends on the weather, doesn't it? I hope this rain" (drops had begun to patter overhead) "doesn't mean that the summer's over for good."

"Oh, you can sail just the same," said Davies, "unless it's very bad. There's plenty of sheltered water. There's bound to be a change soon. But then there are the ducks. The colder and stormier it is, the better for them."

I had forgotten the ducks and the cold, and, suddenly presented as a shooting-box in inclement weather, the Dulcibella lost ground in my estimation, which she had latterly gained.

"I'm fond of shooting," I said, "but I'm afraid I'm only a fair-weather yachtsman, and I should much prefer sun and scenery."

"Scenery," he repeated, reflectively. "I say, you must have thought it a queer taste of mine to cruise about on that outlandish Frisian coast. How would you like that sort of thing?"

"I should loathe it," I answered, promptly, with a clear conscience. "Weren't you delighted yourself to get to the Baltic? It must be a wonderful contrast to what you described. Did you ever see another yacht there?"

"Only one," he answered. "Good night!"

"Good night!"

CHAPTER V

WANTED, A NORTH WIND

NOTHING disturbed my rest that night, so adaptable is youth and so masterful is nature. At times I was remotely aware of a threshing of rain and a humming of wind, with a nervous kicking of the little hull, and at one moment I dreamt I saw an apparition by candle-light of Davies, clad in pyjamas and huge top-boots, grasping a misty lantern of gigantic proportions. But the apparition mounted the ladder and disappeared, and I passed to other dreams.

A blast in my ear, like the voice of fifty trombones, galvanised me into full consciousness. The musician, smiling and tousled, was at my bedside, raising a foghorn to his lips with deadly intention. "It's a way we have in the Dulcibella," he said, as I started up on one elbow. "I didn't startle you much, did I?" he added.

"Well, I like the mattinata better than the cold douche," I answered, thinking of yesterday.

"Fine day and magnificent breeze!" he answered. My sensations this morning were vastly livelier than those of yesterday at the same hour. My limbs were supple again and my head clear. Not even the searching wind could mar the ecstasy of that plunge down to smooth, seductive sand, where I buried greedy fingers and looked through a medium blue, with that translucent blue, fairy-faint and angel-pure, that you see in perfection only in the heart of ice. Up again to sun, wind and the forest whispers from the shore; down just once more to see the uncouth anchor stabbing the sand's soft bosom with one rusty fang, deaf and inert to the Dulcibella's puny efforts to drag him from his prey. Back, holding by the cable as a rusty clue from heaven to earth, up to that bourgeois little maiden's bows; back to breakfast, with an appetite not to be blunted by condensed milk and somewhat passé bread. An hour later we had dressed the Dulcibella for the road, and were gaming into the grey void of yesterday, now a noble expanse of wind-whipped blue, half surrounded by distant hills, their every outline vivid in the rain-washed air.

I cannot pretend that I really enjoyed this first sail into the open, though I was keenly anxious to do so. I felt the thrill of those forward leaps, heard that persuasive song the foam sings under the lee-bow, saw the dashing harmonies of sea and sky; but sensuous perception was deadened by nervousness. The yacht looked smaller than ever outside the quiet fiord. The song of the foam seemed very near, the wave crests aft very high. The novice in sailing clings desperately to the thought of sailors—effective, prudent persons, with a typical jargon and a typical dress, versed in local currents and winds. I could not help missing this professional element. Davies, as he sat grasping his beloved tiller, looked strikingly efficient in his way, and supremely at home in his surroundings; but he looked the amateur through and through, as with one hand, and (it seemed) one eye, he wrestled with a spray-splashed chart half unrolled on the deck beside him. All his casual ways returned to me—his casual talk and that last adventurous voyage to the Baltic, and the suspicions his reticence had aroused.

"Do you see a monument anywhere?" he said, all at once; and, before I could answer: "We must take another reef." He let go of the tiller and relit his pipe, while the yacht rounded sharply to, and in a twinkling was tossing head to sea with loud claps of her canvas and passionate jerks of her boom, as the wind leapt on its quarry, now turning to bay, with redoubled force. The sting of spray in my eyes and the Babel of noise dazed me; but Davies, with a pull on the fore-sheet, soothed the tormented little ship, and left her coolly sparring with the waves while he shortened sail and puffed his pipe. An hour later the narrow vista of Als Sound was visible, with quiet old Sonderburg sunning itself on the island shore, and the Dybbol heights towering above—the Dybbol of bloody memory; scene of the last desperate stand of the Danes in '64, ere the Prussians wrested the two fair provinces from them.

"It's early to anchor, and I hate towns," said Davies, as one section of a lumbering pontoon bridge opened to give us passage. But I was firm on the need for a walk, and got my way on condition that I bought stores as well, and returned in time to admit of further advance to a "quiet anchorage." Never did I step on the solid earth with stranger feelings, partly due to relief from confinement, partly to that sense of independence in travelling, which, for those who go down to the sea in small ships, can make the foulest coal-port in Northumbria seem attractive. And here I had fascinating Sonderburg, with its broad-eaved houses of carved woodwork, each fresh with cleansing, yet reverend with age its fair-haired Viking-like men, and rosy, plain-faced women, with their bullet foreheads and large mouths Sonderburg still Danish to the core under its Teutonic veneer. Crossing the bridge I climbed the Dybbol—dotted with memorials of that heroic defence—and thence could see the wee form and gossamer rigging of the Dulcibella on the silver ribbon of the Sound, and was eminded by the sight that there were stores to be ought. So I hurried down again to the old quarter nd bargained over eggs and bread with a dear old ady, pink as a débutante, who made a patriotic pretence f not understanding German, and called in her strapping on, whose few words of English, being chiefly nautical lang picked up on a British trawler, were peculiarly seless for the purpose. Davies had tea ready when I ame aboard again, and, drinking it on deck, we proeeded up the sheltered Sound, which, in spite of its mposing name, was no bigger than an inland river, nly the hosts of rainbow jelly-fish reminding us that e were threading a highway of ocean. There is no ise and fall of tide in these regions to disfigure the shore ith mud. Here was a shelving gravel bank; there bed of whispering rushes; there again young birch rees growing to the very brink, each wearing a stocking f bright moss and setting its foot firmly in among olden leaves and scarlet fungus.

Davies was pre-occupied, but he lighted up when I alked of the Danish war. "Germany's a thundering reat nation," he said; "I wonder if we shall ever ight her." A little incident that happened after we nchored deepened the impression left by this converation. We crept at dusk into a shaded back-water, here our keel almost touched the gravel bed. Opposite us on the Alsen shore there showed, clean-cut against he sky, the spire of a little monument rising from a eafy hollow.

"I wonder what that is," I said. It was scarcely a inute's row in the dinghy, and when the anchor was own we sculled over to it. A bank of loam led to gorse and bramble. Pushing aside some branches we came to a slender Gothic memorial in grey stone, inscribed with bas-reliefs of battle scenes, showing Prussians forcing a landing in boats and Danes resisting with savage tenacity. In the failing light we spelt out an inscription: "Den bie dem Meeres Uebergange und der Eroberung von Alsen am 29 Juni 1864 heldenmüthig gefallenen zum ehrenden Gedächtniss." "To the honoured memory of those who died heroically at the invasion and storming of Alsen." I knew the German passion for commemoration; I had seen similar memorials on Alsatian battlefields, and several on the Dybbol only that afternoon; but there was something in the scene, the hour, and the circumstances, which made this one seem singularly touching. As for Davies, I scarcely recognised him; his eyes flashed and filled with tears as he glanced from the inscription to the path we had followed and the water beyond. "It was a landing in boats, I suppose," he said, half to himself. "I wonder they managed it. What does heldenmüthig mean?"—"Heroically."—"Heldenmüthig gefallenen," he repeated, under his breath, lingering on each syllable. He was like a schoolboy reading of Waterloo.

Our conversation at dinner turned naturally on war, and in naval warfare I found I had come upon Davies's literary hobby. I had not hitherto paid attention to the medley on our bookshelf, but I now saw that, besides a Nautical Almanack and some dilapidated "Sailing Directions," there were several books on the cruises of small yachts, and also some big volumes crushed in anyhow or lying on the top. Squinting painfully at them I saw Mahan's "Life of Nelson," Brassey's "Naval Annual," and others.

"It's a tremendously interesting subject," said Davies, pulling down (in two pieces) a volume of Mahan's "Influence of Sea Power."

Dinner flagged (and froze) while he illustrated a point by reference to the much-thumbed pages. He was very keen, and not very articulate. I knew just enough to be an intelligent listener, and, though hungry, was delighted to hear him talk.

"I'm not boring you, am I?" he said, suddenly.

"I should think not," I protested. "But you might just have a look at the chops."

They had indeed been crying aloud for notice for some minutes, and drew candid attention to their neglect when they appeared. The diversion they caused put Davies out of vein. I tried to revive the subject, but he was reserved and diffident.

The untidy bookshelf reminded me of the logbook, and when Davies had retired with the crockery to the forecastle, I pulled the ledger down and turned over the leaves. It was a mass of short entries, with cryptic abbreviations, winds, tides, weather, and courses appearing to predominate. The voyage from Dover to Ostend was dismissed in two lines: "Under way 7 p.m., wind W.S.W. moderate; West Hinder 5 a.m., outside all banks; Ostend 11 a.m." The Scheldt had a couple of pages very technical and staccato in style. Inland Holland was given a contemptuous summary, with some half-hearted allusions to windmills, and so on, and a caustic word or two about boys, paint, and canal smells.

At Amsterdam technicalities began again, and a brisker tone pervaded the entries, which became progressively fuller as the writer cruised on the Frisian coast. He was clearly in better spirits, for here and there were quaint and laboured efforts to describe nature out of material which, as far as I could judge, was repellent enough to discourage the most brilliant and observant of writers; with an occasional note of a visit on shore, generally reached by a walk of half a mile over sand, and of talks with shop people and fishermen. But such lighter relief was rare. The bulk dealt with channels and shoals with weird and depressing names, with the centre-plate, the sails, and the wind, buoys and "booms," tides and "berths" for the night. "Kedging off" appeared to be a frequent diversion; "running aground" was of almost daily occurrence.

It was not easy reading, and I turned the leaves rapidly. I was curious, too, to see the latter part. I came to a point where the rain of little sentences, pattering out like small shot, ceased abruptly. It was at the end of September 9th. That day, with its "kedging" and "boom-dodging," was filled in with the usual detail. The log then leapt over three days, and went on: "Sept. 13*th.*—Wind W.N.W. fresh. Decided to go to Baltic. Sailed 4 a.m. Quick passage E. ½ S. to mouth of Weser. Anchored for night under Hohenhörn Sand. Sept. 14*th.*—Nil. Sept. 15*th.*—Under way at 4 a.m. Wind East moderate. Course W. by S.; four miles; N.E. by N. fifteen miles Norderpiep 9.30. Eider River 11.30." This recital of naked facts was quite characteristic when "passages" were concerned, and any curiosity I had felt about his reticence on the previous night would have been rather allayed than stimulated had I not noticed that a page had been torn out of the book just at this point. The frayed edge left had been pruned and picked into very small limits; but dissimulation was not Davies's strong point, and a child could have seen that a leaf was missing, and that the entries, starting from the evening of September 9th (where a page ended), had been written together at one sitting. I was on the point of calling to Davies, and chaffing him with having committed a grave offence against maritime law in having "cooked" his log; but I checked myself, I scarcely know why, probably because I guessed the joke would touch a sensitive place and fail. Delicacy shrank from seeing him compelled either to amplify a deception or blunder out a confession—he was too easy a prey; and, after all, the matter was of small moment. I returned the book to the shelf, the only definite result of its perusal being to recall my promise to keep a diary myself, and I then and there dedicated a notebook to the purpose.

We were just lighting our cigars when we heard voices and the splash of oars, followed by a bump against the hull which made Davies wince, as violations of his paint always did. "Guten Abend; wo fahren Sie hin?" greeted us as we climbed on deck. It turned out to be some jovial fishermen returning to their smack from a visit to Sonderburg. A short dialogue proved to them that we were mad Englishmen in bitter need of charity.

"Come to Satrup," they said; "all the smacks are there, round the point. There is good punch in the inn."

Nothing loth, we followed in the dinghy, skirted a bend of the Sound, and opened up the lights of a village, with some smacks at anchor in front of it. We were escorted to the inn, and introduced to a formidable beverage, called coffee-punch, and a smoke-wreathed circle of smacksmen, who talked German out of courtesy, but were Danish in all else. Davies was at once at home with them, to a degree, indeed, that I envied. His German was of the crudest kind, bizarre in vocabulary and comical in accent; but the freemasonry of the sea, or some charm of his own, gave intuition to both him and his hearers. I cut a poor figure in this nautical gathering, though Davies, who persistently referred to me as "meiner Freund," tried hard to represent me as a kindred spirit and to include me in the general talk. I was detected at once as an uninteresting hybrid. Davies, who sometimes appealed to me for a word, was deep in talk over anchorages and ducks, especially, as I well remember now, about the chance of sport in a certain Schlei Fiord. I fell into utter neglect, till rescued by a taciturn person in spectacles and a very high cap, who appeared to be the only landsman present. After silently puffing smoke in my direction for some time, he asked me if I was married, and if not, when I proposed to be. After this inquisition he abandoned me.

It was eleven before we left this hospitable inn, escorted by the whole party to the dinghy. Our friends of the smack insisted on our sharing their boat out of pure good-fellowship—for there was not nearly room for us —and would not let us go till a bucket of fresh-caught fish had been emptied into her bottom. After much shaking of scaly hands, we sculled back to the Dulcibella, where she slept in a bed of tremulous stars.

Davies sniffed the wind and scanned the tree-tops, where light gusts were toying with the leaves.

"Sou'-west still," he said, "and more rain coming. But it's bound to shift into the north."

"Will that be a good wind for us?"

"It depends where we go," he said, slowly. "I was asking those fellows about duck-shooting. They seemed to think the best place would be Schlei Fiord. That's about fifteen miles south of Sonderburg, on the way to Kiel. They said there was a pilot chap living at the mouth who would tell us all about it. They weren't very encouraging though. We should want a north wind for that."

"I don't care where we go," I said, to my own surprise.

"Don't you really?" he rejoined, with sudden warmth. Then, with a slight change of voice, "You mean it's all very jolly about here?"

Of course I meant that. Before we went below we both looked for a moment at the little grey memorial; its slender fretted arch outlined in tender lights and darks above the hollow on the Alsen shore. The night was that of September 27th, the third I had spent on the Dulcibella.

CHAPTER VI

SCHLEI FIORD

I MAKE no apology for having described these early days in some detail. It is no wonder that their trivialities are as vividly before me as the colours of earth and sea in this enchanting corner of the world. For every trifle, sordid or picturesque, was relevant; every scrap of talk a link; every passing mood critical for good or ill. So slight indeed were the determining causes that changed my autumn holiday into an undertaking the most momentous I have ever approached.

Two days more preceded the change. On the first, the south-westerly wind still holding, we sallied forth into Augustenburg Fiord, "to practise smartness in a heavy thresh," as Davies put it. It was the day of dedication for those disgusting oilskins, immured in whose stiff and odorous angles, I felt distressfully cumbersome; a day of proof indeed for me, for heavy squalls swept incessantly over the loch, and Davies, at my own request, gave me no rest. Backwards and forwards we tacked, blustering into coves and out again, reefing and unreefing, now stung with rain, now warmed with sun, but never with time to breathe or think.

I wrestled with intractable ropes, slaves if they could be subdued, tyrants if they got the upper hand; creeping, craning, straining, I made the painful round of the deck, while Davies, hatless and tranquil, directed my blundering movements.

"Now take the helm and try steering in a hard breeze to windward. It's the finest sport on earth."

So I grappled with the niceties of that delicate craft; smarting eyes, chafed hands, and dazed brain all pressed into the service, whilst Davies, taming the ropes the while, shouted into my ear the subtle mysteries of the art; that fidgetting ripple in the luff of the mainsail, and the distant rattle from the hungry jib—signs that they are starved of wind and must be given more; the heavy list and wallow of the hull, the feel of the wind on your cheek instead of your nose, the broader angle of the burgee at the masthead—signs that they have too much, and that she is sagging recreantly to leeward instead of fighting to windward. He taught me the tactics for meeting squalls, and the way to press your advantage when they are defeated—the iron hand in the velvet glove that the wilful tiller needs if you are to gain your ends with it; the exact set of the sheets necessary to get the easiest and swiftest play of the hull—all these things and many more I struggled to appre-

mend, careless for the moment as to whether they were worth knowing, but doggedly set on knowing them. Needless to say, I had no eyes for beauty. The wooded inlets we dived into gave a brief respite from wind and spindrift, but called into use the lead and the centre-board tackle—two new and cumbrous complexities. Davies's passion for intricate navigation had to be sated even in these secure and tideless waters.

"Let's get in as near as we can—you stand by the lead," was his formula; so I made false casts, tripped up in the slack, sent rivers of water up my sleeves, and committed all the other gaucheries that beginners in the art commit, while the sand showed whiter beneath the keel, till Davies regretfully drew off and shouted: 'Ready about, centre-plate down," and I dashed down to the trappings of that diabolical contrivance, the only part of the Dulcibella's equipment that I hated fiercely to the last. It had an odious habit when lowered of spouting jets of water through its chain-lead on to the cabin floor. One of my duties was to gag it with cotton-waste, but even then its choking gurgle was a most uncomfortable sound in your dining-room. In a minute the creek would be behind us and we would be thumping our stem into the short hollow waves of the fiord, and lurching through spray and rain for some point on the opposite shore. Of our destination and objects, if we had any, I knew nothing. At the northern end of the fiord, just before we turned, Davies had turned dreamy in the most exasperating way, for I was steering at the time and in mortal need of sympathetic guidance, if I was to avoid a sudden jibe. As though continuing aloud some internal debate, he held a one-sided argument to the effect that it was no use going further north. Ducks, weather, and charts figured in it, but I did not follow the pros and cons. I only know that we suddenly turned and began to " battle " south again. At sunset we were back once more in the same quiet pool among the trees and fields of Als Sound, a wondrous peace succeeding the turmoil. Bruised and sodden, I was extricating myself from my oily prison, and later was tasting (though not nearly yet in its perfection) the unique exultation that follows such a day, when, glowing all over, deliciously tired and pleasantly sore, you eat what seems ambrosia, be it only tinned beef; and drink nectar, be it only distilled from terrestrial hops or coffee berries, and inhale as culminating luxury balmy fumes which even the happy Homeric gods knew naught of.

On the following morning, the 30th, a joyous shout of " Nor'-west wind " sent me shivering on deck, in the small hours, to handle rain-stiff canvas and cutting chain. It was a cloudy, unsettled day, but still enough after yesterday's boisterous ordeal. We retraced our way past Sonderburg, and thence sailed for a faint line of pale green on the far south-western horizon. It was during this passage that an incident occurred which, slight as it was, opened my eyes to much.

A flight of wild duck crossed our bows at some little distance, a wedge-shaped phalanx of craning necks and flapping wings. I happened to be steering while Davies verified our course below; but I called him up at once, and a discussion began about our chances of sport. Davies was gloomy over them.

" Those fellows at Satrup were rather doubtful," he said. " There are plenty of ducks, but I made out that it's not easy for strangers to get shooting. The whole country's so very civilised; it's not wild enough, is it? "

He looked at me. I had no very clear opinion. It was anything but wild in one sense, but there seemed to be wild enough spots for ducks. The shore we were passing appeared to be bordered by lonely marshes, though a spacious champaign showed behind. If it were not for the beautiful places we had seen, and my growing taste for our way of seeing them, his disappointing vagueness would have nettled me more than it did. For, after all, he had brought me out loaded with sporting equipment under a promise of shooting.

"I thought you proposed making inquiries at Schlei Fiord," I said. "Let us do that, and take our chance; if there's no sport to be had, it can't be helped. By the look of the chart it's a splendid fiord; we can explore it and have shelter if there's more bad weather. If it gets very bad, we must just see." Davies kept me to the point.

"Bad weather is what we want for ducks," he said; "but I'm afraid we're in the wrong place for them. Now, if it was the North Sea, among those Frisian islands——" His tone was timid and interrogative, and I felt at once that he was sounding me as to some unpalatable plan whose nature began to dawn on me.

He stammered on through a sentence or two about "wildness" and "nobody to interfere with you," and then I broke in: "You surely don't want to leave the Baltic?"

"Why not?" said he, staring into the compass.

"Hang it, man!" I returned, tartly, "here we are in October, the summer over, and the weather gone to pieces. We're alone in a cockle-shell boat, at a time when every other yacht of our size is laying up for the winter. Luckily, we seem to have struck an ideal cruising-ground, with a wide choice of safe fiords and a good prospect of ducks, if we choose to take a little trouble about them. You can't mean to waste time and run risks" (I thought of the torn leaf in the log-book) "in a long voyage to those forbidding haunts of yours in the North Sea."

"It's not very long," said Davies, doggedly. "Part of it's canal, and the rest is quite safe if you're careful. There's plenty of sheltered water, and it's not really necessary——"

"What's it all for?" I interrupted, impatiently. "We haven't tried for shooting here yet. You've no notion, have you, of getting the boat back to England this autumn?"

"England?" he muttered. "Oh, I don't much care." Again his vagueness jarred on me; there seemed to be some bar between us, invisible and insurmountable. And, after all, what was I doing here? Roughing it in a shabby little yacht, utterly out of my element, with a man who, a week ago, was nothing to me, and who now was a tiresome enigma. Like swift poison the old morbid mood in which I left London spread through me. All I had learnt and seen slipped away; what I had suffered remained. I was on the point of saying something which might have put a precipitate end to our cruise, but he anticipated me.

"I'm awfully sorry," he broke out, "for being such a selfish brute. I don't know what I was thinking about. You're a brick to join me in this sort of life, and I'm afraid I'm an infernally bad host. Of course this is just the place to cruise. I forgot about the scenery, and all that. Let's ask about the ducks here. As you say, we're sure to get sport if we worry and push a bit. We must be nearly there now—yes, there's the entrance. Take the helm, will you ? "

He sprang up the mast like a monkey, and gazed over the land from the cross-trees. I looked up at my enigma and thanked Providence I had not spoken ; for no one could have resisted his frank outburst of good nature. Yet it occurred to me that, considering the conditions of our life, our intimacy was strangely slow in growth. I had no clue yet as to where his idiosyncrasies began and his self ended, and he, I surmised, was in the same stage towards me. Otherwise I should have pressed him further now, for I felt convinced that there was some mystery in his behaviour which I had not yet accounted for. However, light was soon to break.

I could see no sign of the entrance he had spoken of, and no wonder, for it is only eighty yards wide, though it leads to a fiord thirty miles long. All at once we were jolting in a tumble of sea, and the channel grudgingly disclosed itself, stealing between marshes and meadows and then broadening to a mere, as at Ekken. We anchored close to the mouth, and not far from a group of vessels of a type that afterwards grew very familiar to me. They were sailing-barges, something like those that ply in the Thames, bluff-bowed, high-sterned craft of about fifty tons, ketch-rigged, and fitted with lee-boards, very light spars, and a long tip-tilted bowsprit. (For the future I shall call them "galliots.") Otherwise the only sign of life was a solitary white house —the pilot's house, the chart told us—close to the northern point of entrance. After tea we called on the pilot. Patriarchally installed before a roaring stove, in the company of a buxom bustling daughter-in-law and some rosy grandchildren, we found a rotund and rubicund person, who greeted us with a hoarse roar of welcome in German, which instantly changed, when he saw us, to the funniest broken English, spoken with intense relish and pride. We explained ourselves and our mission as well as we could through the hospitable interruptions caused by beer and the strains of a huge musical box, which had been set going in honour of our arrival. Needless to say, I was read like a book at once, and fell into the part of listener.

"Yes, yes," he said, "all right. There is plenty ducks, but first we will drink a glass beer; then we will shift your ship, captain—she lies not good there." (Davies started up in a panic, but was waved back to his beer.) "Then we will drink together another glass beer; then we will talk of ducks—no, then we will kill ducks—that is better. Then we will have plenty glasses beer."

This was an unexpected climax, and promised well for our prospects. And the programme was fully carried out. After the beer our host was packed briskly by his daughter into an armour of woollen gaiters, coats, and mufflers, topped with a worsted helmet, which left nothing of his face visible but a pair of twinkling eyes. Thus equipped, he led the way out of doors, and roared for Hans and his gun, till a great gawky youth, with high cheek-bones and a downy beard, came out from the yard and sheepishly shook our hands.

Together we repaired to the quay, where the pilot stood, looking like a genial ball of worsted, and bawled hoarse directions while we shifted the Dulcibella to a berth on the farther shore close to the other vessels. We returned with our guns, and the interval for refreshments followed. It was just dusk when we sallied out again, crossed a stretch of bog-land, and took up strategic posts round a stagnant pond. Hans had been sent to drive, and the result was a fine mallard and three ducks. It was true that all fell to the pilot's gun, perhaps owing to Hans's filial instinct and his parent's canny egotism in choosing his own lair, or perhaps it was chance; but the shooting-party was none the less a triumphal success. It was celebrated with beer and music as before, while the pilot, an infant on each podgy knee, discoursed exuberantly on the glories of his country and the Elysian content of his life. "There is plenty beer, plenty meat, plenty money, plenty ducks," summed up his survey.

It may have been fancy, but Davies, though he had fits and starts of vivacity, seemed very inattentive, considering that we were sitting at the feet of so expansive an oracle. It was I who elicited most of the practical information—details of time, weather, and likely places for shooting, with some shrewd hints as to the kind of people to conciliate. Whatever he thought of me, I warmed with sympathy towards the pilot, for he assumed that we had done with cruising for the year, and thought us mad enough as it was to have been afloat so long, and madder still to intend living on "so little a ship" when we could live on land with beer and music handy. I was tempted to raise the North Sea question, just to watch Davies under the thunder of rebukes which would follow. But I refrained from a wish to be tender with him, now that all was going so well. The Frisian Islands were an extravagant absurdity now. I did not even refer to them as we pulled back to the Dulcibella, after swearing eternal friendship with the good pilot and his family.

Davies and I turned in good friends that night—or rather I should say that I turned in, for I left him sucking an empty pipe and aimlessly fingering a volume of Mahan; and once when I woke in the night I felt somehow that his bunk was empty and that he was there in the dark cabin, dreaming.

CHAPTER VII

THE MISSING PAGE

I WOKE (on October 1st) with that dispiriting sensation that a hitch has occurred in a settled plan. It was explained when I went on deck, and I found the Dulcibella wrapped in a fog, silent, clammy, nothing visible from her decks but the ghostly hull of a galliot at anchor near us. She must have brought up there in the night, for there had been nothing so close the evening before; and I remembered that my sleep had been broken once by sounds of rumbling chain and gruff voices.

"This looks pretty hopeless for to-day," I said, with a shiver, to Davies, who was laying the breakfast.

"Well, we can't do anything till this fog lifts," he answered, with a good deal of resignation. Breakfast was a cheerless meal. The damp penetrated to the very cabin, whose roof and walls wept a fine dew. I had dreaded a bathe, and yet missed it, and the ghastly light made the tablecloth look dirtier than it naturally was, and all the accessories more sordid. Something had gone wrong with the bacon, and the lack of egg-cups was not in the least humorous.

Davies was just beginning, in his summary way, to tumble the things together for washing up, when there was a sound of a step on deck, two sea-boots appeared on the ladder, and, before we could wonder who the visitor was, a little man in oilskins and a sou'-wester was stooping towards us in the cabin door, smiling affectionately at Davies out of a round grizzled beard.

"Well met, captain," he said, quietly, in German. "Where are you bound to this time?"

"Bartels!" exclaimed Davies, jumping up. The two stooping figures, young and old, beamed at one another like father and son.

"Where have you come from? Have some coffee. How's the Johannes? Was that you that came in last night? I'm delighted to see you!" (I spare the reader his uncouth lingo.) The little man was dragged in and seated on the opposite sofa to me.

"I took my apples to Kappeln," he said, sedately, "and now I sail to Kiel, and so to Hamburg, where my wife and children are. It is my last voyage of the year. You are no longer alone, captain, I see." He had taken off his dripping sou'-wester and was bowing ceremoniously towards me.

"Oh, I quite forgot!" said Davies, who had been kneeling on one knee in the low doorway, absorbed in his visitor. "This is 'meiner Freund,' Herr Carruthers. Carruthers, this is my friend, Schiffer Bartels, of the galliot Johannes."

Was I never to be at an end of the puzzles which Davies presented to me? All the impulsive heartiness died out of his voice and manner as he uttered the last few words, and there he was, nervously glancing from the visitor to me, like one who, against his will or from tactlessness, has introduced two persons who he knows will disagree.

There was a pause while he fumbled with the cups poured some cold coffee out and pondered over it a though it were a chemical experiment. Then he mut tered something about boiling some more water, and took refuge in the forecastle. I was ill at ease at thi period with seafaring men, but this mild little perso was easy ground for a beginner. Besides, when he tool off his oilskin coat he reminded me less of a sailor tha of a homely draper of some country town, with hi clean turned-down collar and neatly fitting frieze jacket We exchanged some polite platitudes about the fog an his voyage last night from Kappeln, which appeare to be a town some fifteen miles up the fiord.

Davies joined in from the forecastle with an excess o warmth which almost took the words out of my mouth We exhausted the subject very soon, and then my vis-à-vi smiled paternally at me, as he had done at Davies, an said, confidentially :—

" It is good that the captain is no more alone. He i a fine young man—Heaven, what a fine young man ! love him as my son—but he is too brave, too reckless It is good for him to have a friend."

I nodded and laughed, though in reality I was ver far from being amused.

" Where was it you met ? " I asked.

" In an ugly place, and in ugly weather," he an swered, gravely, but with a twinkle of fun in his eye " But has he not told you ? " he added, with ponderou slyness. " I came just in time. No ! what am I saying He is brave as a lion and quick as a cat. I think he can not drown ; but still it was an ugly place and ugly——

" What are you talking about, Bartels ? " interrupte Davies, emerging noisily with a boiling kettle.

I answered the question. "I was just asking your end how it was you made his acquaintance."

"Oh, he helped me out of a bit of a mess in the North ea, didn't you, Bartels?" he said.

"It was nothing," said Bartels. "But the North ea is no place for your little boat, captain. So I have ld you many times. How did you like Flensburg? fine town, is it not? Did you find Herr Krank, the rpenter? I see you have placed a little mizzen-mast. he rudder was nothing much, but it was well that it eld to the Eider. But she is strong and good, your little ip, and—Heaven!—she had need be so." He chuckled, nd shook his head at Davies as at a wayward child.

This is all the conversation that I need record. For y part I merely waited for its end, determined on my ourse, which was to know the truth once and for all, nd make an end of these distracting mystifications. Davies plied his friend with coffee, and kept up the lk gallantly; but affectionate as he was, his manner lainly showed that he wanted to be alone with me.

The gist of the little skipper's talk was a parental arning that, though we were well enough here in the Ost-See," it was time for little boats to be looking r winter quarters. That he himself was going by the iel Canal to Hamburg to spend a cosy winter as a ecent citizen at his warm fireside, and that we should llow his example. He ended with an invitation to us visit him on the Johannes, and with suave farewells isappeared into the fog. Davies saw him into his oat, returned without wasting a moment, and sat down n the sofa opposite me.

"What did he mean?" I asked.

"I'll tell you," said Davies. "I'll tell you the whole thing. As far as you're concerned it's partly a confessior Last night I had made up my mind to say nothing, bu when Bartels turned up I knew it must all come out It's been fearfully on my mind, and perhaps you'll b able to help me. But it's for you to decide."

"Fire away!" I said.

"You know what I was saying about the Frisian Islands the other day? A thing happened there which I never told you, when you were asking about my cruise."

"It began near Norderney," I put in.

"How did you guess that?" he asked.

"You're a bad hand at duplicity," I replied. "Go on."

"Well, you're quite right, it was there, on Septembe 9th. I told you the sort of thing I was doing at tha time, but I don't think I said that I made inquirie from one or two people about duck-shooting, and ha been told by some fishermen at Borkum that there wa a big sailing-yacht in those waters, whose owner, German of the name of Dollmann, shot a good deal, an might give me some tips. Well, I found this yach one evening, knowing it must be her from the descrip tion I had. She was what is called a 'barge-yacht, of fifty or sixty tons, built for shallow water on th lines of a Dutch galliot, with lee-boards and thos queer round bows and square stern. She's something like those galliots anchored near us now. You some times see the same sort of yacht in English waters only there they copy the Thames barges. She looked clipper of her sort, and very smart; varnished all ove and shining like gold. I came on her about sunset after a long day of exploring round the Ems estuary She was lying in——"

"" Wait a bit, let's have the chart," I interrupted.
] Davies found it and spread it on the table between us, st pushing back the cloth and the breakfast things to e end, where they lay in a slovenly litter. This was e of the only two occasions on which I ever saw him ostpone the rite of washing up, and it spoke volumes r the urgency of the matter in hand.

" Here it is," said Davies (see Map A), and I looked ith a new and strange interest at the long string of ender islands, the parallel line of coast, and the confuon of shoals, banks, and channels which lay between.
Here's Norderney, you see. By the way, there's a arbour there at the west end of the island, the only al harbour on the whole line of islands, Dutch or erman, except at Terschelling. There's quite a big own there, too, a watering place, where Germans go r sea-bathing in the summer. Well, the Medusa, that as her name, was lying in the Riff Gat roadstead, flying e German ensign, and I anchored for the night pretty ear her. I meant to visit her owner later on, but I ery nearly changed my mind, as I always feel rather fool on smart yachts, and my German isn't very ood. However, I thought I might as well; so, after inner, when it was dark, I sculled over in the dinghy, ailed a sailor on deck, said who I was, and asked if I ould see the owner. The sailor was a surly sort of ap, and there was a good long delay while I waited n deck, feeling more and more uncomfortable. Presntly a steward came up and showed me down the mpanion and into the saloon, which, after this, looked -well, horribly gorgeous—you know what I mean, lush lounges, silk cushions, and that sort of thing.
inner seemed to be just over, and wine and fruit were on the table. Herr Dollmann was there at his coffe

I introduced myself somehow——"

"Stop a moment," I said; "what was he like?"

"Oh, a tall, thin chap, in evening dress; abou fifty I suppose, with greyish hair and a short beard I'm not good at describing people. He had a high bulging forehead, and there was something about hi
—but I think I'd better tell you the bare facts first.
can't say he seemed pleased to see me, and he couldn speak English, and, in fact, I felt infernally awkward Still, I had an object in coming, and as I was there thought I might as well gain it."

The notion of Davies in his Norfolk jacket and rust flannels haranguing a frigid German in evening dre in a "gorgeous" saloon tickled my fancy greatly.

"He seemed very much astonished to see me; ha evidently seen the Dulcibella arrive, and had wondere what she was. I began as soon as I could about th ducks, but he shut me up at once, said I could do nothin hereabouts. I put it down to sportsman's jealousy—you know what that is. But I saw I had come to th wrong shop, and was just going to back out and en this unpleasant interview, when he thawed a bit, offere me some wine, and began talking in quite a friendly wa taking a great interest in my cruise and my plans fo the future. In the end we sat up quite late, thoug
I never felt really at my ease. He seemed to be takin stock of me all the time, as though I were some ne animal." (How I sympathised with that German
"We parted civilly enough, and I rowed back an turned in, meaning to potter on eastwards early ne day.

"But I was knocked up at dawn by a sailor with essage from Dollmann asking if he could come to reakfast with me. I was rather flabbergasted, but idn't like to be rude, so I said, 'Yes.' Well, he came, nd I returned the call—and—well, the end of it was hat I stayed at anchor there for three days." This as rather abrupt.

"How did you spend the time?" I asked. Stopping hree days anywhere was an unusual event for him, as I new from his log.

"Oh, I lunched or dined with him once or twice—ith them, I ought to say," he added, hurriedly. "His aughter was with him. She didn't appear the evening first called."

"And what was she like?" I asked, promptly, before e could hurry on.

"Oh, she seemed a very nice girl," was the guarded eply, delivered with particular unconcern, "and—the nd of it was that I and the Medusa sailed away in ompany. I must tell you how it came about, just in a ew words for the present.

"It was his suggestion. He said he had to sail to Iamburg, and proposed that I should go with him in he Dulcibella as far as the Elbe, and then, if I liked, could take the ship canal at Brunsbüttel through to Kiel and the Baltic. I had no very fixed plans of my wn, though I had meant to go on exploring eastwards etween the islands and the coast, and so reach the lbe in a much slower way. He dissuaded me from his, sticking to it that I should have no chance of ucks, and urging other reasons. Anyway, we settled o sail in company direct to Cuxhaven, in the Elbe. Vith a fair wind and an early start it should be only he day's sail of about sixty miles.

"The plan only came to a head on the evening of the third day, September 12.

"I told you, I think, that the weather had broken after a long spell of heat. That very day it had been blowing pretty hard from the west, and the glass was falling still. I said, of course, that I couldn't go with him if the weather was too bad, but he prophesied a good day, said it was an easy sail, and altogether put me on my mettle. You can guess how it was. Perhaps I had talked about single-handed cruising as though it were easier than it was, though I never meant it in a boasting way, for I hate that sort of thing, and besides there is no danger if you're careful——"

"Oh, go on," I said.

"Anyway, we went next morning at six. It was a dirty-looking day, wind W.N.W., but his sails were going up and mine followed. I took two reefs in, and we sailed out into the open and steered E.N.E. along the coast for the Outer Elbe Lightship about fifty knots off. Here it all is, you see." (He showed me the course on the chart.) "The trip was nothing for his boat, of course, a safe, powerful old tub, forging through the sea as steady as a house. I kept up with her easily at first. My hands were pretty full, for there was a hard wind on my quarter and a troublesome sea; but as long as nothing worse came I knew I should be all right, though I also knew that I was a fool to have come.

"All went well till we were off Wangeroog, the last of the islands—here—and then it began to blow really hard. I had half a mind to chuck it and cut into the Jade River, down there; but I hadn't the face to, so I hove to and took in my last reef." (Simple words, simply uttered; but I had seen the operation in calm water ad shuddered at the present picture.) "We had been out level till then, but with my shortened canvas I ll behind. Not that that mattered in the least. I new my course, had read up my tides, and, thick as ie weather was, I had no doubt of being able to pick o the lightship. No change of plan was possible now. he Weser estuary was on my starboard hand, but the hole place was a lee-shore and a mass of unknown anks—just look at them. I ran on, the Dulcibella do- g her level best, but we had some narrow shaves of eing pooped. I was about here, say six miles south- est of the lightship,* when I suddenly saw that the Medusa had hove to right ahead, as though waiting ll I came up. She wore round again on the course s I drew level, and we were alongside for a bit. Doll- ann lashed the wheel, leaned over her quarter, and outed, very slowly and distinctly so that I could nderstand: 'Follow me—sea too bad for you outside —short cut through sands—save six miles.'

"It was taking me all my time to manage the tiller, ut I knew what he meant at once, for I had been ver the chart carefully the night before.† You see, the hole bay between Wangeroog and the Elbe is encum- ered with sand. A great jagged chunk of it runs out om Cuxhaven in a north-westerly direction for fifteen iles or so, ending in a pointed spit, called the Scharhorn. o reach the Elbe from the west you have to go right out- de this, round the lightship, which is off the Scharhorn, nd double back. Of course, that's what all big vessels o. But, as you see, these sands are intersected here nd there by channels, very shallow and winding, ex- ctly like those behind the Frisian Islands. Now look at this one, which cuts right through the big chunk of san and comes out near Cuxhaven. The Telte * it's called It's miles wide, you see, at the entrance, but later o it is split into two by the Hohenhörn bank; then i gets shallow and very complicated, and ends in a mer tidal driblet with another name. It's just the sort c channel I should like to worry into on a fine day c with an off-shore wind. Alone, in thick weather an a heavy sea, it would have been folly to attempt i except as a desperate resource. But, as I said, I knev at once that Dollmann was proposing to run for it an guide me in.

* See Chart A. † See Map A.

"I didn't like the idea, because I like doing thing for myself, and, silly as it sounds, I believe I resente being told the sea was too bad for me, which it cer tainly was. Yet the short cut did save several mile and a devil of a tumble off the Scharhorn, where tw tides meet. I had complete faith in Dollmann, and I sup pose I decided that I should be a fool not to take a goo chance. I hesitated, I know; but in the end I nodded and held up my arm as she forged ahead again. Soo after, she shifted her course and I followed. You aske me once if I ever took a pilot. That was the only time.

He spoke with bitter gravity, flung himself back, an felt his pocket for his pipe. It was not meant for dramatic pause, but it certainly was one. I had just glimpse of still another Davies—a Davies five years olde throbbing with deep emotions, scorn, passion, and stub born purpose; a being above my plane, of sterner stuf wider scope. Intense as my interest had become, waited almost timidly while he mechanically ramme tobacco into his pipe and struck ineffectual matches.

* See Chart A.

t that whatever the riddle to be solved, it was no ean one. He repressed himself with an effort, half se, and made his circular glance at the clock, barometer, d skylight, and then resumed.

" We soon came to what I knew must be the beginning the Telte channel. All round you could hear the eakers on the sands, though it was too thick to see em yet. As the water shoaled, the sea, of course, t shorter and steeper. There was more wind—a whole le I should say.

" I kept dead in the wake of the Medusa, but to my sgust I found she was gaining on me very fast. Of urse I had taken for granted, when he said he would ad me in, that he would slow down and keep close to e. He could easily have done so by getting his men to check his sheets or drop his peak. Instead of that e was busting on for all he was worth. Once, in a rain-uall, I lost sight of him altogether; got him faintly ain, but had enough to do with my own tiller not to ant to be peering through the scud after a runaway lot. I was all right so far, but we were fast approach-g the worst part of the whole passage, where the Hohen-rn bank blocks the road, and the channel divides. I n't know what it looks like to you on the chart—rhaps fairly simple, because you can follow the twists the channels, as on a ground-plan; but a stranger ming to a place like that (where there are no buoys, ind you) can tell nothing certain by the eye—unless rhaps at dead low water, when the banks are high and y, and in very clear weather—he must trust to the ad and the compass, and feel his way step by step. knew perfectly well that what I should soon see would e a wall of surf stretching right across and on both sides. To feel one's way in that sort of weather is im possible. You must know your way, or else have a pilot I had one, but he was playing his own game.

"With a second hand on board to steer while I conne I should have felt less of an ass. As it was, I knew ought to be facing the music in the offing, and curse myself for having broken my rule and gone blunderin into this confounded short cut. It was giving mysel away, doing just the very thing that you can't do i single-handed sailing.

"By the time I realised the danger it was far to late to turn and hammer out to the open. I was dee in the bottle-neck bight of the sands, jammed on a le shore, and a strong flood tide sweeping me on. That tide by the way, gave just the ghost of a chance. I had th hours in my head, and knew it was about two-third flood, with two hours more of rising water. That mean the banks would be all covering when I reached them and harder than ever to locate; but it also meant tha I might float right over the worst of them if I hit o a lucky place." Davies thumped the table in disgus "Pah! It makes me sick to think of having to trust t an accident like that, like a lubberly cockney out for boosy Bank Holiday sail. Well, just as I foresaw, th wall of surf appeared clean across the horizon, and curl ing back to shut me in, booming like thunder. When last saw the Medusa she seemed to be charging it like horse at a fence, and I took a rough bearing of her posi tion by a hurried glance at the compass. At that ver moment I thought she seemed to luff and show some o her broadside; but a squall blotted her out and gav me hell with the tiller. After that she was lost in th white mist that hung over the line of breakers. I kep my bearing as well as I could, but I was already of the channel. I knew that by the look of the ter, and as we neared the bank I saw it was all awash ll without the vestige of an opening. I wasn't going chuck her on to it without an effort; so, more by tinct than with any particular hope, I put the helm wn, meaning to work her along the edge on the chance spotting a way over. She was buried at once by the am sea, and the jib flew to blazes; but the reefed ys'l stood, she recovered gamely, and I held on, ough I knew it could only be for a few minutes, as e centre-plate was up, and she made frightful leeway wards the bank.

'I was half blinded by scud, but suddenly I noticed at looked like a gap, behind a spit which curled out ht ahead. I luffed still more to clear this spit, but e couldn't weather it. Before you could say knife e was driving across it, bumped heavily, bucked for-rd again, bumped again, and—ripped on in deeper ter! I can't describe the next few minutes. I was some sort of channel, but a very narrow one, and e sea broke everywhere. I hadn't proper command her; for the rudder had crocked up somehow at the t bump. I was like a drunken man running for his e down a dark alley, barking himself at every corner. couldn't last long, and finally we went crash on to nething and stopped there, grinding and banging. So led that little trip under a pilot.

'Well, it was like this—there was really no danger" I opened my eyes at the characteristic phrase. "I an, that lucky stumble into a channel was my salva-n. Since then I had struggled through a mile of sands, of which lay behind me like a breakwater against the gale. They were covered, of course, and seething lil soapsuds; but the force of the sea was deadened. Th Dulce was bumping, but not too heavily. It was nearin high tide, and at half ebb she would be high and dry.

"In the ordinary way I should have run out a kedg with the dinghy, and at the next high water sailed furth in and anchored where I could lie afloat. The troub was now that my hand was hurt and my dinghy stove i not to mention the rudder business. It was the fir bump on the outer edge that did the damage. There wa a heavy swell there, and when we struck, the dingh which was towing astern, came home on her painter an down with a crash on the yacht's weather quarter. stuck out one hand to ward it off and got it nipped c the gunwale. She was badly stove in and useless, so couldn't run out the kedge"—this was Greek to m but I let him go on—"and for the present my hand wa too painful even to stow the boom and sails, which we whipping and racketing about anyhow. There was th rudder, too, to be mended; and we were several mil from the nearest land. Of course, if the wind fell, it wa all easy enough; but if it held or increased it was a poo look-out. There's a limit to strain of that sort—an other things might have happened.

"In fact, it was precious lucky that Bartels turne up. His galliot was at anchor a mile away, up a branc of the channel. In a clear between squalls he saw u and, like a brick, rowed his boat out—he and his bo and a devil of a pull they must have had. I was gla enough to see them—no, that's not true; I was in suc a fury of disgust and shame that I believe I should hav been idiot enough to say I didn't want help, if he hadn just nipped on board and started work. He's a terr work, that little mouse of a chap. In half an hour had stowed the sails, unshackled the big anchor, n out fifty fathoms of warp, and hauled her off there d then into deep water. Then they towed her up the annel—it was dead to leeward and an easy job—and rthed her near their own vessel. It was dark by that ne, so I gave them a drink, and said good-night. It ew a howling gale that night, but the place was safe ough, with good ground-tackle.

" The whole affair was over ; and after supper I thought rd about it all."

CHAPTER VIII

THE THEORY

AVIES leaned back and gave a deep sigh, as though still felt the relief from some tension. I did the same, d felt the same relief. The chart, freed from the essure of our fingers, rolled up with a flip, as though say, " What do you think of that ? " I have straight- ed out his sentences a little, for in the excitement of s story they had grown more and more jerky and ellip- al.

" What about Dollmann ? " I asked.

" Of course," said Davies, " what about him ? I dn't get at much that night. It was all so sudden. e only thing I could have sworn to from the first as that he had purposely left me in the lurch that day. pieced out the rest in the next few days, which I'll st finish with as shortly as I can. Bartels came aboard xt morning, and though it was blowing hard still we anaged to shift the Dulcibella to a place where she ied safely at the mid-day low water, and we could get at her rudder. The lower screw-plate on the stern post had wrenched out, and we botched it up roughly as a make-shift. There were other little breakages, but nothing to matter, and the loss of the jib was nothing as I had two spare ones. The dinghy was past repair just then, and I lashed it on deck.

"It turned out that Bartels was carrying apples from Bremen to Kappeln (in this fiord). and had run into that channel in the sands for shelter from the weather. To-day he was bound for the Eider River, whence, as I told you, you can get through (by river and canal) into the Baltic. Of course the Elbe route, by the new Kaiser Wilhelm Ship Canal, is the shortest. The Eider route is the old one, but he hoped to get rid of some of his apples at Tönning, the town at its mouth. Both routes touch the Baltic at Kiel. As you know, I had been running for the Elbe, but yesterday's muck-up put me off, and I changed my mind—I'll tell you why presently—and decided to sail to the Eider along with the Johannes and get through that way. It cleared from the east next day, and I raced him there, winning hands down, left him at Tönning, and in three days was in the Baltic. It was just a week after I ran ashore that I wired to you. You see, I had come to the conclusion that that chap was a spy."

In the end it came out quite quietly and suddenly, and left me in profound amazement. "I wired to you—that chap was a spy." It was the close association of these two ideas that hit me hardest at the moment. For a second I was back in the dreary splendour of the London club-room, spelling out that crabbed scrawl from Davies, and fastidiously criticising its proposal in the light of a holiday. Holiday! What was to be its issue?

hilling and opaque as the fog that filtered through the kylight there flooded my imagination a mist of doubt nd fear.

" A spy ! " I repeated blankly. " What do you ean ? Why did you wire to me ? A spy of what—of hom ? "

" I'll tell you how I worked it out," said Davies. " I on't think ' spy ' is the right word ; but I mean some- hing pretty bad.

" He purposely put me ashore. I don't think I'm uspicious by nature, but I know something about boats nd the sea. I know he could have kept close to me if e had chosen, and I saw the whole place at low water vhen we left those sands on the second day. Look t the chart again. Here's the Hohenhörn bank that showed you as blocking the road.* It's in two pieces —first the west and then the east. You see the Telte hannel dividing into two branches and curving round it. Both branches are broad and deep, as channels go in hose waters. Now, in sailing in I was nowhere near ither of them. When I last saw Dollmann he must ave been steering straight for the bank itself, at a oint somewhere here, quite a mile from the northern rm of the channel, and two from the southern. I ollowed by compass, as you know, and found nothing ut breakers ahead. How did I get through ? That's vhere the luck came in. I spoke of only two channels, hat is, round the bank—one to the north, the other to he south. But look closely and you'll see that right hrough the centre of the West Hohenhörn runs another, very narrow and winding one, so small that I hadn't ven noticed it the night before, when I was going over the chart. That was the one I stumbled into in that tailor's fashion, as I was groping along the edge of the surf in a desperate effort to gain time. I bolted down it blindly, came out into this strip of open water, crossed that aimlessly, and brought up on the edge of the East Hohenhörn, here. It was more than I deserved. I can see now that it was a hundred to one in favour of my striking on a bad place outside, where I should have gone to pieces in three minutes."

* See Chart A.

"And how did Dollmann go?" I asked.

"It's as clear as possible," Davies answered. "He doubled back into the northern channel when he had misled me enough. Do you remember my saying that when I last saw him I thought he had luffed and showed his broadside? I had another bit of luck in that. He was luffing towards the north—so it struck me through the blur—and when I in my turn came up to the bank, and had to turn one way or the other to avoid it, I think I should naturally have turned north too, as he had done. In that case I should have been done for, for I should have had a mile of the bank to skirt before reaching the north channel, and should have driven ashore long before I got there. But as a matter of fact I turned south."

"Why?"

"Couldn't help it. I was running on the starboard tack—boom over to port; to turn north would have meant a jibe, and as things were I couldn't risk one. It was blowing like fits; if anything had carried away I should have been on shore in a jiffy. I scarcely thought about it at all, but put the helm down and turned her south. Though I knew nothing about it, that little central channel was now on my port hand, distant bout two cables. The whole thing was luck from eginning to end."

Helped by pluck, I thought to myself, as I tried with y landsman's fancy to conjure up that perilous scene. s to the truth of the affair, the chart and Davies's ersion were easy enough to follow, but I felt only half onvinced. The "spy," as Davies strangely called his ilot, might have honestly mistaken the course himself, utstripped his convoy inadvertently, and escaped dis- ster as narrowly as she did. I suggested this on the our of the moment, but Davies was impatient.

"Wait till you hear the whole thing," he said. "I ust go back to when I first met him. I told you that n that first evening he began by being as rude as a ear and as cold as stone, and then became suddenly iendly. I can see now that in the talk that followed e was pumping me hard. It was an easy game to play, or I hadn't seen a gentleman since Morrison left me, was tremendously keen about my voyage, and I thought ne chap was a good sportsman, even if he was a bit ark about the ducks. I talked quite freely—at least, s freely as I could with my bad German—about my ast fortnight's sailing; how I had been smelling out ll the channels in and out of the islands, how interested had been in the whole business, puzzling out the effect f the winds on the tides, the set of the currents, and o on. I talked about my difficulties, too; the changes the buoys, the prehistoric rottenness of the English harts. He drew me out as much as he could, and in he light of what followed I can see the point of scores f his questions.

"The next day and the next I saw a good deal of im, and the same thing went on. And then there were my plans for the future. My idea was, as I told you, to go on exploring the German coast just as I had the Dutch. His idea—Heavens, how plainly I see it now!—was to choke me off, get me to clear out altogether from that part of the coast. That was why he said there were no ducks. That was why he cracked up the Baltic as a cruising-ground and shooting-ground. And that was why he broached and stuck to that plan of sailing in company direct to the Elbe. It was to see me clear."

"He improved on that."

"Yes, but after that, it's guess-work. I mean that I can't tell when he first decided to go one better and drown me. He couldn't count for certain on bad weather, though he held my nose to it when it came. But, granted that he wanted to get rid of me altogether, he got a magnificent chance on that trip to the Elbe lightship. I expect it struck him suddenly, and he acted on the impulse. Left to myself I was all right; but the short cut was a grand idea of his. Everything was in its favour—wind, sea, sand, tide. He thinks I'm dead."

"But the crew?" I said; "what about the crew?"

"That's another thing. When he first hove to, waiting for me, of course they were on deck (two of them, I think) hauling at sheets. But by the time I had drawn up level the Medusa had worn round again on her course. and no one was on deck but Dollmann at the wheel. No one overheard what he said."

"Wouldn't they have seen you again?"

"Very likely not; the weather was very thick, and the Dulce is very small."

The incongruity of the whole business was striking me. Why should anyone want to kill Davies, and why should Davies, the soul of modesty and simplicity, imagine that anyone wanted to kill him? He must have cogent reasons, for he was the last man to give way to a morbid fancy.

"Go on," I said. "What was his motive? A German finds an Englishman exploring a bit of German coast, determines to stop him, and even to get rid of him. It looks so far as if you were thought to be the spy."

Davies winced. "But he's not a German," he said, hotly. "He's an Englishman."

"An Englishman?"

"Yes, I'm sure of it. Not that I've much to go on. He professed to know very little English, and never spoke it, except a word or two now and then to help me out of a sentence; and as to his German, he seemed to me to speak it like a native; but, of course, I'm no judge." Davies sighed. "That's where I wanted someone like you. You would have spotted him at once, if he wasn't German. I go more by a—what do you call it?—a——"

"General impression," I suggested.

"Yes, that's what I mean. It was something in his looks and manner; you know how different we are from foreigners. And it wasn't only himself, it was the way he talked—I mean about cruising and the sea, especially. It's true he let me do most of the talking; but, all the same—how can I explain it? I felt we understood one another, in a way that two foreigners wouldn't. He pretended to think me a bit crazy for coming so far in a small boat, but I could swear he knew as much about the game as I did; for lots of little questions he asked had the right ring in them. Mind you, all this is an after-thought. I should never have bothered about it

—I'm not cut out for a Sherlock Holmes—if it hadn't been for what followed.

"It's rather vague," I said. "Have you no more definite reason for thinking him English?"

"There were one or two things rather more definite," said Davies, slowly. "You know when he hove to and hailed me, proposing the short cut, I told you roughly what he said. I forget the exact words, but 'abschneiden' came in—'durch Watten' and 'abschneiden' (they call the banks 'watts,' you know); they were simple words, and he shouted them loud, so as to carry through the wind. I understood what he meant, but, as I told you, I hesitated before consenting. I suppose he thought I didn't understand, for just as he was drawing ahead again he pointed to the suth'ard, and then shouted through his hands as a trumpet 'Verstehen Sie? short-cut through sands; follow me!' the last two sentences in downright English. I can hear those words now, and I'll swear they were in his native tongue. Of course I thought nothing of it at the time. I was quite aware that he knew a few English words, though he had always mispronounced them; an easy trick when your hearer suspects nothing. But I needn't say that just then I was observant of trifles. I don't pretend to be able to unravel a plot and steer a small boat before a heavy sea at the same moment."

"And if he was piloting you into the next world he could afford to commit himself before you parted! Was there anything else? By the way, how did the daughter strike you? Did she look English, too?"

Two men cannot discuss a woman freely without a deep foundation of intimacy, and, until this day, the subject had never arisen between us in any form. It as the last that was likely to, for I could have divined nat Davies would have met it with an armour of reserve.

e was busy putting on this armour now; yet I could ot help feeling a little brutal as I saw how badly he inted his clumsy suit of mail. Our ages were the same, ut I laugh now to think how old and blasé I felt as the ush warmed his brown skin, and he slowly propounded ne verdict, "Yes, I think she did."

"She talked nothing but German, I suppose?"

"Oh, of course."

"Did you see much of her?"

"A good deal."

"Was she——" (how frame it?) "Did she want you o sail to the Elbe with them?"

"She seemed to," admitted Davies, reluctantly, lutching at his ally, the match-box. "But, hang it, lon't dream that she knew what was coming," he added, vith sudden fire.

I pondered and wondered, shrinking from further nquisition, easy as it would have been with so truthful victim, and banishing all thought of ill-timed chaff.
There was a cross-current in this strange affair, whose lepth and strength I was beginning to gauge with inreasing seriousness. I did not know my man yet, and did not know myself. A conviction that events in he near future would force us into complete mutual onfidence withheld me from pressing him too far. I eturned to the main question: who was Dollmann, and vhat was his motive? Davies struggled out of his rmour.

"I'm convinced," he said, "that he's an Englishman n German service. He must be in German service, for e had evidently been in those waters a long time, and knew every inch of them; of course, it's a very lonely part of the world, but he has a house on Norderney Island; and he, and all about him, must be well known to a certain number of people. One of his friends I happened to meet; what do you think he was? A naval officer. It was on the afternoon of the third day, and we were having coffee on the deck of the Medusa, and talking about next day's trip, when a little launch came buzzing up from seaward, drew alongside, and this chap I'm speaking of came on board, shook hands with Dollmann, and stared hard at me. Dollmann introduced us, calling him Commander von Brüning, in command of the torpedo gunboat Blitz. He pointed towards Norderney, and I saw her—a low, grey rat of a vessel—anchored in the Roads about two miles away. It turned out that she was doing the work of fishery guardship on that part of the coast.

"I must say I took to him at once. He looked a real good sort, and a splendid officer, too—just the sort of chap I should have liked to be. You know I always wanted—but that's an old story, and can wait. I had some talk with him, and we got on capitally as far as we went, but that wasn't far, for I left pretty soon, guessing that they wanted to be alone."

"Were they alone then?" I asked, innocently.

"Oh, Fräulein Dollmann was there, of course," explained Davies, feeling for his armour again.

"Did he seem to know them well?" I pursued, inconsequently.

"Oh, yes, very well."

Scenting a faint clue, I felt the need of feminine weapons for my sensitive antagonist. But the opportunity passed.

"That was the last I saw of him," he said. "We sailed, as I told you, at daybreak next morning. Now, have you got any idea what I'm driving at?"

"A rough idea," I answered. "Go ahead."

Davies sat up to the table, unrolled the chart with a vigorous sweep of his two hands, and took up his parable with new zest.

"I start with two certainties," he said. "One is that I was 'moved on' from that coast, because I was too inquisitive. The other is that Dollmann is at some devil's work there which is worth finding out. Now"—he paused in a gasping effort to be logical and articulate. 'Now—well, look at the chart. No, better still, look first at this map of Germany. It's on a small scale, and you can see the whole thing." He snatched down a pocket-map from the shelf and unfolded it.* "Here's this huge empire, stretching half over central Europe—an empire growing like wildfire, I believe, in people, and wealth, and everything. They've licked the French, and the Austrians, and are the greatest military power in Europe. I wish I knew more about all that, but what I'm concerned with is their sea-power. It's a new thing with them, but it's going strong, and that Emperor of theirs is running it for all it's worth. He's a splendid chap, and anyone can see he's right. They've got no colonies to speak of, and must have them, like us. They can't get them and keep them, and they can't protect their huge commerce without naval strength. The command of the sea is the thing nowadays, isn't it? I say, don't think these are my ideas," he added, naïvely. "It's all out of Mahan and those fellows. Well, the Germans have got a small fleet at present, but it's a thundering good one, and they're building hard. There's the —— and the ——." He broke off into a digression on armaments and speeds in which I could not follow him. He seemed to know every ship by heart. I had to recall him to the point. "Well, think of Germany as a new sea-power," he resumed. "The next thing is, what is her coast-line? It's a very queer one, as you know, split clean in two by Denmark, most of it lying east of that and looking on the Baltic, which is practically an inland sea, with its entrance blocked by Danish islands. It was to evade that block that William built the ship canal from Kiel to the Elbe, but that could be easily smashed in war-time. Far the most important bit of coast-line is that which lies west of Denmark and looks on the North Sea. It's there that Germany gets her head out into the open, so to speak. It's there that she fronts us and France, the two great sea-powers of Western Europe, and it's there that her greatest ports are and her richest commerce.

* See Map A.

"Now it must strike you at once that it's ridiculously short compared with the huge country behind it. From Borkum to the Elbe, as the crow flies, is only seventy miles. Add to that the west coast of Schleswig, say 120 miles. Total, say, two hundred. Compare that with the seaboard of France and England. Doesn't it stand to reason that every inch of it is important? Now what sort of coast is it? Even on this small map you can see at once, by all those wavy lines, shoals and sand everywhere, blocking nine-tenths of the land altogether, and doing their best to block the other tenth where the great rivers run in. Now let's take it bit by bit. You see it divides itself into three. Beginning from the west the first piece is from Borkum to Wan-eroog—fifty odd miles. What's that like? A string f sandy islands backed by sand; the Ems river at the vestern end, on the Dutch border, leading to Emden —not much of a place. Otherwise, no coast towns at ll. Second piece: a deep sort of bay consisting of the hree great estuaries—the Jade, the Weser, and the Elbe—leading to Wilhelmshaven (their North Sea naval ase), Bremen, and Hamburg. Total breadth of bay wenty odd miles only; sandbanks littered about all hrough it. Third piece: the Schleswig coast, hopeessly fenced in behind a six to eight mile fringe of sand. No big towns; one moderate river, the Eider. Let's eave that third piece aside. I may be wrong, but, in hinking this business out, I've pegged away chiefly t the other two, the seventy mile stretch from Borkum o the Elbe—half of it estuaries, and half islands. It was there that I found the Medusa, and it's that stretch hat, thanks to him, I missed exploring."

I made an obvious conjecture. "I suppose there are forts and coast defences? Perhaps he thought you would see too much. By the way, he saw your naval books, of course?"

"Exactly. Of course that was my first idea; but t can't be that. It doesn't explain things in the least. To begin with, there are no forts and can be none in that irst division, where the islands are. There might be something on Borkum to defend the Ems; but it's very unlikely, and, anyway, I had passed Borkum and was t Norderney. There's nothing else to defend. Of course it's different in the second division, where the big rivers are. There are probably hosts of forts and mines round Wilhelmshaven and Bremerhaven, and at Cuxhaven just at the mouth of the Elbe. Not that I should ever dream of bothering about them; every steamer that goes in would see as much as me. Personally, I much prefer to stay on board, and don't often go on shore. And, good Heavens!" (Davies leant back and laughed joyously) "do I look like that kind of spy?"

I figured to myself one of those romantic gentlemen that one reads of in sixpenny magazines, with a kodak in his tie-pin, a sketch-book in the lining of his coat, and a selection of disguises in his hand luggage. Little disposed for merriment as I was, I could not help smiling, too.

"About this coast," resumed Davies. "In the event of war it seems to me that every inch of it would be important, sand and all. Take the big estuaries first, which, of course, might be attacked or blockaded by an enemy. At first sight you would say that their main channels were the only things that mattered. Now, in time of peace there's no secrecy about the navigation of these. They're buoyed and lighted like streets, open to the whole world, and taking an immense traffic; well charted, too, as millions of pounds in commerce depend on them. But now look at the sands they run through, intersected, as I showed you, by threads of channels, tidal for the most part, and probably only known to smacks and shallow coasters, like that galliot of Bartels.

"It strikes me that in a war a lot might depend on these, both in defence and attack, for there's plenty of water in them at the right tide for patrol-boats and small torpedo craft, though I can see they take a lot of knowing. Now, say we were at war with Germany—both sides could use them as lines between the three estuaries; and to take our own case, a small torpedo-boat (not a destroyer, mind you) could on a dark night cut clean through from the Jade to the Elbe and play the deuce with the shipping there. But the trouble is that I doubt if there's a soul in our fleet who knows those channels. We haven't coasters there; and, as to yachts, it's a most unlikely game for an English yacht to play at; but it does so happen that I have a fancy for that sort of thing and would have explored those channels in the ordinary course." I began to see his drift.

"Now for the islands. I was rather stumped there at first, I grant, because, though there are lashings of sand behind them, and the same sort of intersecting channels, yet there seems nothing important to guard or attack.

"Why shouldn't a stranger ramble as he pleases through them? Still Dollmann had his headquarters there, and I was sure that had some meaning. Then it struck me that the same point held good, for that strip of Frisian coast adjoins the estuaries, and would also form a splendid base for raiding midgets, which could travel unseen right through from the Ems to the Jade, and so to the Elbe, as by a covered way between a line of forts.

"Now here again it's an unknown land to us. Plenty of local galliots travel it, but strangers never, I should say. Perhaps at the most an occasional foreign yacht gropes in at one of the gaps between the islands for shelter from bad weather, and is precious lucky to get in safe. Once again, it was my fad to like such places, and Dollmann cleared me out. He's not a German, but he's in with Germans, and naval Germans too. He's established on that coast, and knows it by heart. And he tried to drown me. Now what do you think?" He gazed at me long and anxiously.

CHAPTER IX

I SIGN ARTICLES

It was not an easy question to answer, for the affair was utterly outside all my experience; its background the sea, and its actual scene a region of the sea of which I was blankly ignorant. There were other difficulties that I could see perhaps better than Davies, an enthusiast with hobbies, who had been brooding in solitude over his dangerous adventure. Yet both narrative and theory (which have lost, I fear, in interpretation to the reader) had strongly affected me; his forcible roughnesses, tricks of manner, sudden bursts of ardour, sudden retreats into shyness, making up a charm I cannot render. I found myself continually trying to see the man through the boy, to distinguish sober judgment from the hot-headed vagaries of youth. Not that I dreamed for a moment of dismissing the story of his wreck as an hallucination. His clear blue eyes and sane simplicity threw ridicule on such treatment.

Evidently, too, he wanted my help, a matter that might well have influenced my opinion on the facts, had he been other than he was. But it would have taken a "finished and finite clod" to resist the attraction of the man and the enterprise; and I take no credit whatever for deciding to follow him, right or wrong. So, when I stated my difficulties, I knew very well that we should go.

"There are two main points that I don't under-tand," I said. "First, you've never explained why n Englishman should be watching those waters and jjecting intruders; secondly, your theory doesn't supply ufficient motive. There may be much in what you say bout the navigation of those channels, but it's not nough. You say he wanted to drown you—a big harge, requiring a big motive to support it. But I don't deny that you've got a strong case." Davies ighted up. "I'm willing to take a good deal for granted —until we find out more."

He jumped up, and did a thing I never saw him do before or since—bumped his head against the cabin roof.

"You mean that you'll come?" he exclaimed. "Why, I hadn't even asked you! Yes, I want to go back and clear up the whole thing. I know now that I want to; telling it all to you has been such an immense relief. And a lot depended on you, too, and that's why I've been feeling such an absolute hypocrite. I say, how can I apologise?"

"Don't worry about me; I've had a splendid time. And I'll come right enough; but I should like to know exactly what you——"

"No; but wait till I just make a clean breast of it —about you, I mean. You see, I came to the conclusion that I could do nothing alone; not that two are really necessary for managing the boat in the ordinary way, but for this sort of job you do want two; besides, I can't speak German properly, and I'm a dull chap all round. If my theory, as you call it, is right, it's a case for sharp wits, if ever there was one; so I thought of you. You're clever, and I knew you had lived in Germany and knew German, and I knew," he added, with a little awkwardness, "that you had done a good deal of yachting; but of course I ought to have told you what you were in for—roughing it in a small boat with no crew. I felt ashamed of myself when you wired back so promptly, and when you came—er—" Davies stammered and hesitated in the humane resolve not to wound my feelings. "Of course I couldn't help noticing that it wasn't what you expected," was the delicate summary he arrived at. "But you took it splendidly," he hastened to add. "Only, somehow, I couldn't bring myself to talk about the plan. It was good enough of you to come out at all, without bothering you with harebrained schemes. Besides, I wasn't even sure of myself. It's a tangled business. There were reasons, there are reasons still"—he looked nervously at me—"which—well, which make it a tangled business." I had thought a confidence was coming, and was disappointed. "I was in an idiotic state of uncertainty," he hurried on; "but the plan grew on me more and more, when I saw how you were taking to the life and beginning to enjoy yourself. All that about the ducks on the Frisian coast was humbug; part of a stupid idea of decoying you there and gaining time. However, you quite naturally objected, and last night I meant to chuck the whole thing up and give you the best time here I could. Then Bartels turned up——"

"Stop," I put in. "Did you know he might turn up when you sailed here?"

"Yes," said Davies, guiltily. "I knew he might; and now it's all come out, and you'll come! What a fool I've been!"

Long before he had finished I had grasped the whole meaning of the last few days, and had read their meaning into scores of little incidents which had puzzled me.

"For goodness' sake, don't apologise," I protested. I could make confessions, too, if I liked. And I doubt if you've been such a fool as you think. I'm a patient that wants careful nursing, and it has been the merest chance all through that I haven't rebelled and bolted. We've got a good deal to thank the weather for, and other little stimulants. And you don't know yet my reasons for deciding to try your cure at all."

"My cure?" said Davies; "what in the world do you mean? It was jolly decent of you to——"

"Never mind! There's another view of it, but it doesn't matter now. Let's return to the point. What's your plan of action?"

"It's this," was the prompt reply: "to get back to the North Sea, via Kiel and the ship canal. Then there will be two objects: one, to work back to Norderney, where I left off before, exploring all those channels through the estuaries and islands; the other, to find Dollmann, discover what he's up to, and settle with him. The two things may overlap, we can't tell yet. I don't even know where he and his yacht are; but I'll be bound they're somewhere in those same waters, and probably back at Norderney."

"It's a delicate matter," I mused, dubiously, "if your theory's correct. Spying on a spy——"

"It's not like that," said Davies, indignantly. "Anyone who likes can sail about there and explore those waters. I say, you don't really think it's like that, do you?"

"I don't think you're likely to do anything dishonourable," I hastened to explain. "I grant you the sea's public property in your sense. I only mean that developments are possible, which you don't reckon on.

There must be more to find out than the mere navigation of those channels, and if that's so, mightn't we come to be genuine spies ourselves ? "

" And, after all, hang it ! " exclaimed Davies, " if it comes to that, why shouldn't we ? I look at it like this. The man's an Englishman, and if he's in with Germany he's a traitor to us, and we as Englishmen have a right to expose him. If we can't do it without spying we've a right to spy, at our own risk——"

" There's a stronger argument than that. He tried to take your life."

" I don't care a rap about that. I'm not such an ass as to thirst for revenge and all that, like some chap in a shilling shocker. But it makes me wild to think of that fellow masquerading as a German, and up to who knows what mischief—mischief enough to make him want to get rid of any one. I'm keen about the sea, and I think they're apt to be a bit slack at home," he continued inconsequently. " Those Admiralty chaps want waking up. Anyway, as far as I'm concerned, it's quite natural that I should look him up again."

" Quite," I agreed ; " you parted friends, and they may be delighted to see you. You'll have plenty to talk about."

" H'm," said Davies, withered into silence by the " they." " Hullo ! I say, do you know it's three o'clock ? How the time has gone ! And, by Jove ! I believe the fog's lifting."

I returned, with a shock, to the present, to the weeping walls, the discoloured deal table, the ghastly breakfast litter—all the visible symbols of the life I had pledged myself to. Disillusionment was making rapid headway when Davies returned, and said, with energy :—

"What do you say to starting for Kiel at once? The fog's going, and there's a breeze from the sou'-west."

"Now?" I protested. "Why, it'll mean sailing all night, won't it?"

"Oh, no," said Davies. "Not with luck."

"Why, it's dark at seven!"

"Yes, but it's only twenty-five miles. I know it's not exactly a fair wind, but we shall lie closehauled most of the way. The glass is falling, and we ought to take this chance."

To argue about winds with Davies was hopeless, and the upshot was that we started lunchless. A pale sun was flickering out of masses of racing vapour, and through delicate vistas between them the fair land of Schleswig now revealed and now withdrew her pretty face, as though smiling adieux to her faithless courtiers.

The clank of our chain brought up Bartels to the deck of the Johannes, rubbing his eyes and pulling round his throat a grey shawl, which gave him a comical likeness to a lodging house landlady receiving the milk in morning déshabillé.

"We're off, Bartels," said Davies, without looking up from his work. "See you at Kiel, I hope."

"You are always in a hurry, captain," bleated the old man, shaking his head. "You should wait till to-morrow. The sky is not good, and it will be dark before you are off Eckenförde."

Davies laughed, and very soon his mentor's sad little figure was lost in haze.

That was a curious evening. Dusk soon fell, and the devil made a determined effort to unman me; first, with the scrambled tea which was the tardy substitute for an orderly lunch, then with the new and nauseous duty of filling the side-lights, which meant squatting in the fo'c'sle to inhale paraffin and dabble in lamp-black; lastly, with an all-round attack on my nerves as the night fell on our frail little vessel, pitching on her precarious way through driving mist. In a sense I think I went through the same sort of mental crisis as when I sat upon my portmanteau at Flensburg. The main issue was not seriously in question, for I had signed on in the Dulcibella for good or ill; but in doing so I had outrun myself, and still wanted an outlook, a mood suited to the enterprise, proof against petty discouragements. Not for the first time a sense of the ludicrous came to my assistance, as I saw myself fretting in London under my burden of self-imposed woes, nicely weighing that insidious invitation, and stepping finally into the snare with the dignity due to my importance; kidnapped as neatly as ever a peaceful clerk was kidnapped by a lawless press-gang, and, in the end, finding as the arch-conspirator a guileless and warm-hearted friend, who called me clever, lodged me in a cell, and blandly invited me to talk German to the purpose, as he was aiming at a little secret service on the high seas. Close in the train of Humour came Romance, veiling her face, but I knew it was the rustle of her robes that I heard in the foam beneath me; I knew that it was she who handed me the cup of sparkling wine and bade me drink and be merry. Strange to me though it was, I knew the taste when it touched my lips. It was not that bastard concoction I had tasted in the pseudo-Bohemias of Soho; it was not the showy but insipid beverage I should have drunk my fill of at Morven Lodge; it was the purest of her pure vintages, stilling the ancient inspiration which, under many ises, quickens thousands of better brains than mine, ut whose essence is always the same; the gay pursuit a perilous quest. Then and there I tried to clinch ie matter and keep that mood. In the main I think I ucceeded, though I had many lapses.

For the present my veins tingled with the draught. he wind humming into the mainsail, the ghostly wave-rests riding up out of the void, whispered a low thrill-ig chorus in praise of adventure. Potent indeed must ie spell have been, for, in reality, that first night sail eemed with terrors for me. It is true that it began ell, for the haze dispersed, as Davies had prophesied, nd Bulk Point Lighthouse guided us safely to the outh of Kiel Fiord. It was during this stage that, rouching together aft, our pipe-bowls glowing sym-athetically, we returned to the problem before us; for e had shot out on our quest with volcanic precipita-ion, leaving much to be discussed. I gleaned a few ore facts, though I dispelled no doubts. Davies had nly seen the Dollmanns on their yacht, where father nd daughter were living for the time. Their villa at orderney, and their home life there, were unknown o him, though he had landed once at the harbour imself. Further, he had heard vaguely of a step-other, absent at Hamburg. They were to have joined er on their arrival at that city, which, be it noted, ands a long way up the Elbe, forty miles and more bove Cuxhaven, the town at the mouth.

The exact arrangement made on the day before the tal voyage was that the two yachts should meet in ie evening at Cuxhaven and proceed up the river ogether. Then, in the ordinary course, Davies would have parted company at Brunsbüttel (fifteen miles up), which is the western terminus of the ship canal to the Baltic. Such at least had been his original intention; but, putting two and two together, I gathered that latterly, and perhaps unconfessed to himself, his resolve had weakened, and that he would have followed the Medusa to Hamburg, or indeed the end of the world, impelled by the same motive that, contrary to all his tastes and principles, had induced him to abandon his life in the islands and undertake the voyage at all. But on that point he was immovably reticent, and all I could conclude was that the strange cross-current connected with Dollmann's daughter had given him cruel pain and had clouded his judgment to distraction, but that he now was prepared to forget or ignore it, and steer a settled course.

The facts I elicited raised several important questions. Was it not known by this time that he and his yacht had survived? Davies was convinced that it was not. "He may have waited at Cuxhaven, or inquired at the lock at Brunsbüttel," he said. "But there was no need, for I tell you the thing was a certainty. If I had struck and stuck on that outer bank, as it was a hundred to one I should do, the yacht would have broken up in three minutes. Bartels would never have seen me, and couldn't have got to me if he had. No one would have seen me. And nothing whatever has happened since to show that they know I'm alive."

"They," I suggested. "Who are 'they'? Who are our adversaries?" If Dollmann were an accredited agent of the German Admiralty—— But, no, it was incredible that the murder of a young Englishman should be connived at in modern days by a friendly and civilised government! Yet, if he were not such an agent, the whole theory fell to the ground.

"I believe," said Davies, "that Dollmann did it off his own bat, and beyond that I can't see. And I don't know that it matters at present. Alive or dead we're doing nothing wrong, and have nothing to be ashamed of."

"I think it matters a good deal," I objected. "Who will be interested in our resurrection, and how are we to go to work, openly or secretly? I suppose we shall keep out of the way as much as we can?"

"As for keeping out of the way," said Davies, jerkily, as he peered to windward under the foresail, "we must pass the ship canal; that's a public highway, where anyone can see you. After that there won't be much difficulty. Wait till you see the place!" He gave a low, contented laugh, which would have frozen my marrow yesterday. "By the way, that reminds me," he added; "we must stop at Kiel for the inside of a day and lay in a lot of stores. We want to be independent of the shore." I said nothing. Independence of the shore in a seven-tonner in October! What an end to aim at!

About nine o'clock we weathered the point, entered Kiel Fiord, and began a dead beat to windward of seven miles to the head of it where Kiel lies. Hitherto, save for the latent qualms concerning my total helplessness if anything happened to Davies, interest and excitement had upheld me well. My alarms only began when I thought them nearly over. Davies had frequently urged me to turn in and sleep, and I went so far as to go below and coil myself up on the lee sofa with my pencil and diary. Suddenly there was a flapping and rattling on deck, and I began to slide on to the floor. "What's happened?" I cried, in a panic, for there was Davies stooping in at the cabin door.

"Nothing," he said, chafing his hands for warmth; "I'm only going about. Hand me the glasses, will you? There's a steamer ahead. I say, if you really don't want to turn in, you might make some soup. Just let's look at the chart." He studied it with maddening deliberation, while I wondered how near the steamer was, and what the yacht was doing meanwhile.

"I suppose it's not really necessary for anyone to be at the helm?" I remarked.

"Oh, she's all right for a minute," he said, without looking up. "Two—one and a half—one—lights in line sou'-west by west—got a match?" He expended two, and tumbled upstairs again.

"You don't want me, do you?" I shouted after him.

"No, but come up when you've put the kettle on. It's a pretty beat up the fiord. Lovely breeze."

His legs disappeared. A sort of buoyant fatalism possessed me as I finished my notes and pored over the stove. It upheld me, too, when I went on deck and watched the "pretty beat," whose prettiness was mainly due to the crowd of fog-bound shipping—steamers, smacks, and sailing-vessels—now once more on the move in the confined fairway of the fiord, their baleful eyes of red, green, or yellow, opening and shutting, brightening and fading; while shore-lights and anchor-lights added to my bewilderment, and a throbbing of screws filled the air like the distant roar of London streets. In fact, every time we spun round for our dart across the fiord I felt like a rustic matron gathering her skirts for the transit of the Strand on a busy night. Davies, owever, was the street arab who zigzags under the orses' feet unscathed; and all the time he discoursed lacidly on the simplicity and safety of night-sailing only you are careful, obeyed rules, and burnt good ghts. As we were nearing the hot glow in the sky nat denoted Kiel we passed a huge scintillating bulk noored in mid-stream. "Warships," he murmured, cstatically.

At one o'clock we anchored off the town.

CHAPTER X

HIS CHANCE

I SAY, Davies," I said, "how long do you think this rip will last? I've only got a month's leave."

We were standing at slanting desks in the Kiel post-ffice, Davies scratching diligently at his letter-card, nd I staring feebly at mine.

"By Jove!" said Davies, with a start of dismay; that's only three weeks more; I never thought of that. You couldn't manage to get an extension could you?"

"I can write to the chief," I admitted; "but where's he answer to come to? We're better without an ad-lress, I suppose."

"There's Cuxhaven," reflected Davies; "but that's oo near, and there's—but we don't want to be tied lown to landing anywhere. I tell you what: say 'Post Office, Norderney,' just your name, not the yacht's. We may get there and be able to call for letters." The asual character of our adventure never struck me more trongly than then.

"Is that what you're doing?" I asked.

"Oh, I shan't be having important letters like you."

"But what are you saying?"

"Oh, just that we're having a splendid cruise, and are on our way home."

The notion tickled me, and I said the same in my home letter, adding that we were looking for a friend of Davies's who would be able to show us some sport. I wrote a line, too, to my chief (unaware of the gravity of the step I was taking) saying it was possible that I might have to apply for longer leave, as I had important business to transact in Germany, and asking him kindly to write to the same address. Then we shouldered our parcels and resumed our business.

Two full dinghy-loads of stores we ferried to the Dulcibella, chief among which were two immense cans of petroleum, constituting our reserves of heat and light, and a sack of flour. There were spare ropes and blocks, too; German charts of excellent quality; cigars and many weird brands of sausage and tinned meats, besides a miscellany of oddments, some of which only served in the end to slake my companion's craving for jettison. Clothes were my own chief care, for, freely as I had purged it at Flensburg, my wardrobe was still very unsuitable, and I had already irretrievably damaged two faultless pairs of white flannels. ("We shall be able to throw them overboard," said Davies, hopefully.) So I bought a great pair of seaboots of the country, felt-lined and wooden-soled, and both of us got a number of rough woollen garments (as worn by the local fishermen), breeches, jerseys, helmets, gloves; all of a colour chosen to harmonise with paraffin stains and anchor mud.

The same evening we were taking our last look at the Baltic, sailing past warships and groups of idle yachts attened down for their winter's sleep; while the noble hores of the fiord, with its villas embowered in copper oliage, grew dark and dim above us.

We rounded the last headland, steered for a galaxy f coloured lights, tumbled down our sails, and came to nder the colossal gates of the Holtenau lock. That hese would open to such an infinitesimal suppliant eemed inconceivable. But open they did, with ponder- us majesty, and our tiny hull was lost in the womb of a ock designed to float the largest battleships. I thought f Boulter's on a hot August Sunday, and wondered f I really was the same peevish dandy who had jostled nd sweltered there with the noisy cockney throng a month ago. There was a blaze of electricity overhead, ut utter silence till a solitary cloaked figure hailed us nd called for the captain. Davies ran up a ladder, lisappeared with the cloaked figure, and returned crum- ling a paper into his pocket. It lies before me now, and ets forth, under the stamp of the Königliches Zollamt, hat, in consideration of the sum of ten marks for dues nd four for tonnage, an imperial tug would tow the essel Dulcibella (master A. H. Davies) through the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal from Holtenau to Brunsbüttel. Magnificent condescension! I blush when I look at this ellow document and remember the stately courtesy of he great lock gates; for the sleepy officials of the Königliches Zollamt little knew what an insidious little iper they were admitting into the imperial bosom at he light toll of fourteen shillings.

"Seems cheap," said Davies, joining me, "doesn't t? They've a regular tariff on tonnage, same for achts as for liners. We start at four to-morrow with a lot of other boats. I wonder if Bartels is here."

The same silence reigned, but invisible forces were at work. The inner gates opened and we prised ourselves through into a capacious basin, where lay moored side by side a flotilla of sailing vessels of various sizes. Having made fast alongside a vacant space of quay, we had our dinner, and then strolled out with cigars to look for the Johannes. We found her wedged among a stack of galliots, and her skipper sitting primly below before a blazing stove, reading his Bible through spectacles. He produced a bottle of schnapps and some very small and hard pears, while Davies twitted him mercilessly about his false predictions.

"The sky was not good," was all he said, beaming indulgently at his incorrigible young friend.

Before parting for the night it was arranged that next morning we should lash alongside the Johannes when the flotilla was marshalled for the tow through the canal.

"Karl shall steer for us both," he said, "and we will stay warm in the cabin."

The scheme was carried out, not without much confusion and loss of paint, in the small hours of a dark and drizzling morning. Boisterous little tugs sorted us into parties, and half lost under the massive bulwarks of the Johannes we were carried off into a black inane. If any doubt remained as to the significance of our change of cruising-grounds, dawn dispelled it. View there was none from the deck of the Dulcibella! it was only by standing on the mainboom that you could see over the embankments to the vast plain of Holstein, grey and monotonous under a pall of mist. The soft scenery of the Schleswig coast was a baseless dream of the past, and a cold penetrating rain added the last touch of dramatic completeness to the staging of the new act.

For two days we travelled slowly up the mighty aterway that is the strategic link between the two seas Germany. Broad and straight, massively embanked, by electricity at night till it is lighter than many a eat London street; traversed by great war vessels, ch merchantmen, and humble coasters alike, it is a mbol of the new and mighty force which, controlled y the genius of statesmen and engineers, is thrusting e empire irresistibly forward to the goal of maritime eatness.

"Isn't it splendid?" said Davies. "He's a fine llow, that emperor."

Karl was the shock-headed, stout-limbed boy of about xteen, who constituted the whole crew of the Johannes, nd was as dirty as his master was clean. I felt a certain nvious reverence for this unprepossessing youth, seeing n him a much more efficient counterpart of myself; ut how he and his little master ever managed to work eir ungainly vessel was a miracle I never understood. hlegmatically impervious to rain and cold, he steered e Johannes down the long grey reaches in the wake of e tug, while we and Bartels held snug gatherings down elow, sometimes in his cabin, sometimes in ours. The eating arrangements of the latter began to be a subject f serious concern. We finally did the only logical ing, and brought the kitchen-range into the parlour, xing the Rippingille stove on the forward end of the abin table, where it could warm as well as cook for us. s an ornament it was monstrous, and the taint of oil hich it introduced was a disgusting drawback; but, fter all, the great thing—as Davies said—is to be comrtable, and after that to be clean.

Davies held long consultations with Bartels, who was thoroughly at home in the navigation of the sands we were bound for, his own boat being a type of the very craft which ply in them. I shall not forget the moment when it first dawned on him that his young friend's curiosity was practical; for he had thought that our goal was his own beloved Hamburg, queen of cities, a place to see and die.

"It is too late," he wailed. "You do not know the Nord See as I do."

"Oh, nonsense, Bartels, it's quite safe."

"Safe! And have I not found you fast on Hohenhörn, in a storm, with your rudder broken? God was good to you then, my son."

"Yes, but it wasn't my f——" Davies checked himself. "We're going home. There's nothing in that." Bartels became sadly resigned.

"It is good that you have a friend," was his last word on the subject; but all the same he always glanced at me with a rather doubtful eye. As to Davies and myself, our friendship developed quickly on certain limited lines, the chief obstacle, as I well know now, being his reluctance to talk about the personal side of our quest.

On the other hand, I spoke about my own life and interests, with an unsparing discernment, of which I should have been incapable a month ago, and in return I gained the key to his own character. It was devotion to the sea, wedded to a fire of pent-up patriotism struggling incessantly for an outlet in strenuous physical expression; a humanity, born of acute sensitiveness to his own limitations, only adding fuel to the flame. I learnt for the first time now that in early youth he had failed for the navy, the first of several failures in his career. "And I can't settle down to anything else," he said. "I read no end about it, and yet I am a useless outsider. All I've been able to do is to potter about in small boats; but it's all been wasted till this chance came. I'm afraid you'll not understand how I feel about it; but at last, for once in a way, I see a chance of being useful."

"There ought to be chances for chaps like you," I said, "without the accident of a job such as this."

"Oh, as long as I get it, what matter? But I know what you mean. There must be hundreds of chaps like me—I know a good many myself—who know our coasts like a book—shoals, creeks, tides, rocks; there's nothing in it, it's only practice. They ought to make some use of us as a naval reserve. They tried to once, but it fizzled out, and nobody really cares. And what's the result? Using every man of what reserves we've got, there's about enough to man the fleet on a war footing, and no more. They've tinkered with fishermen, and merchant sailors, and yachting hands, but everyone of them ought to be got hold of; and the colonies, too. Is there the ghost of a doubt that if war broke out there'd be wild appeals for volunteers, aimless cadging, hurry, confusion, waste? My own idea is that we ought to go much further, and train every able-bodied man for a couple of years as a sailor. Army? Oh, I suppose you'd have to give them the choice. Not that I know or care much about the Army, though to listen to people talk you'd think it really mattered as the Navy matters. We're a maritime nation—we've grown by the sea and live by it; if we lose command of it we starve. We're unique in that way, just as our huge empire, only linked by the sea, is unique. And yet, read Brassey, Dilke, and those 'Naval Annuals,' and see what mountains of apathy and conceit have had to be tackled. It's not the people's fault. We've been safe so long, and grown so rich, that we've forgotten what we owe it to. But there's no excuse for those blockheads of statesmen, as they call themselves, who are paid to see things as they are. They have to go to an American to learn their A B C, and it's only when kicked and punched by civilian agitators, a mere handful of men who get sneered at for their pains, that they wake up, do some work, point proudly to it, and go to sleep again, till they get another kick. By Jove! we want a man like this Kaiser, who doesn't wait to be kicked, but works like a nigger for his country, and sees ahead."

"We're improving, aren't we?"

"Oh, of course, we are! But it's a constant uphill fight; and we aren't ready. They talk of a two-power standard——" He plunged away into regions where space forbids me to follow him. This is only a sample of many similar conversations that we afterwards held, always culminating in the burning question of Germany. Far from including me and the Foreign Office among his targets for vague invective, he had a profound respect for my sagacity and experience as a member of that institution; a respect which embarrassed me not a little when I thought of my précis writing and cigarette-smoking, my dancing, and my dining. But I did know something of Germany, and could satisfy his tireless questioning with a certain authority. He used to listen rapt while I described her marvellous awakening in the last generation, under the strength and wisdom of her rulers; her intense patriotic ardour; her seething industrial activity, and, most potent of all, the forces at are moulding modern Europe, her dream of a olonial empire, entailing her transformation from a nd-power to a sea-power. Impregnably based on vast erritorial resources which we cannot molest, the dim stincts of her people, not merely directed but antici- ated by the genius of her ruling house, our great trade val of the present, our great naval rival of the future, le grows, and strengthens, and waits, an ever more for- idable factor in the future of our delicate network f empire, sensitive as gossamer to external shocks, and diating from an island whose commerce is its life, and hich depends even for its daily ration of bread on the ee passage of the seas.

"And we aren't ready for her," Davies would say; we don't look her way. We have no naval base in the orth Sea, and no North Sea Fleet. Our best battle- hips are too deep in draught for North Sea work. And, o crown all, we were asses enough to give her Heligo- nd, which commands her North Sea coast. And sup- osing she collars Holland; isn't there some talk of hat?"

That would lead me to describe the swollen ambitions f the Pan-Germanic party, and its ceaseless intrigues o promote the absorption of Austria, Switzerland, and -a direct and flagrant menace to ourselves—of Holland.

"I don't blame them," said Davies, who, for all his atriotism, had not a particle of racial spleen in his omposition. "I don't blame them; their Rhine eases to be German just when it begins to be most aluable. The mouth is Dutch, and would give them agnificent ports just opposite British shores. We can't lk about conquest and grabbing. We've collared a ne share of the world, and they've every right to be jealous. Let them hate us, and say so; it'll teach t to buck up; and that's what really matters."

In these talks there occurred a singular contact minds. It was very well for me to spin sonorous genera ities, but I had never till now dreamed of being so vulg as to translate them into practice. I had always d tested the meddlesome alarmist, who veils ignoran under noisiness, and for ever wails his chant of lugubrio pessimism. To be thrown with Davies was to receive shock of enlightenment; for here, at least, was a specime of the breed who exacted respect. It is true he mad use of the usual jargon, interlarding his stammerin sentences (sometimes, when he was excited, with th oddest effect) with the conventional catchwords of th journalist and platform speaker. But these were bu accidents; for he seemed to have caught his innermo conviction from the very soul of the sea itself. An arm chair critic is one thing, but a sun-burnt, brine-bur zealot smarting under a personal discontent, athirst f a means, however, tortuous, of contributing his effort the great cause, the maritime supremacy of Britai that was quite another thing. He drew inspiratio from the very wind and spray. He communed wi his tiller, I believe, and marshalled his figures with i help. To hear him talk was to feel a current of clarif ing air blustering into a close club-room, where me bandy ineffectual platitudes, and mumble old shibboleth and go away and do nothing.

In our talk about policy and strategy we were Bi marcks and Rodneys, wielding nations and navies; an indeed, I have no doubt that our fancy took extravaga flights sometimes. In plain fact we were merely tw young gentlemen in a seven-ton pleasure boat, with ste for amateur hydrography and police duty com-ned. Not that Davies ever doubted. Once set on e road he gripped his purpose with child-like faith

d tenacity. It was his " chance."

CHAPTER XI

THE PATHFINDERS

the late afternoon of the second day our flotilla ached the Elbe at Brunsbüttel and ranged up in the ner basin, while a big liner, whimpering like a fretful by, was tenderly nursed into the lock. During the lay Davies left me in charge, and bolted off with oil-can and a milk-jug. An official in uniform was ssing along the quay from vessel to vessel counter-gning papers. I went up to meet him with our receipt r dues, which he signed carelessly. Then he paused d muttered " Dooltzhibella," scratching his head, that was the name. English ? " he asked.
" Yes."
" Little lust-cutter, that is so ; there was an inquiry r you."
" Whom from ? "
" A friend of yours from a big barge-yacht."
" Oh, I know ; she went on to Hamburg, I suppose ? "
" No such luck, captain ; she was outward bound."
What did the man mean ? He seemed to be vastly nused by something.
" When was this—about three weeks ago ? " I asked, differently.
" Three weeks ? It was the day before yesterday."

"What a pity to miss him by so little!" He chuckle and winked.

"Did he leave any message?" I asked.

"It was a lady who inquired," whispered the fellow sniggering.

"Oh, really," I said, beginning to feel highly absurd but keenly curious. "And she inquired about th Dulcibella?"

"Herrgott! she was difficult to satisfy! Stood ove me while I searched the books. 'A very little one,' sh kept saying, and 'Are you sure all the names are here? I saw her into her kleine Boot, and she rowed away i the rain. No, she left no message. It was dirty weathe for a young fräulein to be out alone in. Ach! she wa safe enough, though. To see her crossing the ebb in chop of tide was a treat."

"And the yacht went on down the river? Where wa she bound to?"

"How do I know? Bremen, Wilhelmshaven, Emde —somewhere in the North Sea; too far for you."

"I don't know about that," said I, bravely.

"Ach! you will not follow in that? Are not yo bound to Hamburg?"

"We can change our plans. It seems a pity to hav missed them."

"Think twice, captain, there are plenty of pretty girl in Hamburg. But you English will do anything. Wel viel Glück!"

He moved on, chuckling, to the next boat. Davie soon returned with his cans and an armful of dark, ry loaves, just in time, for, the liner being through, th flotilla was already beginning to jostle into the loc and Bartels was growing impatient.

"They'll last ten days," he said, as we followed the rong, still clinging like a barnacle to the side of the hannes. We spent the few minutes while the lock as emptied in a farewell talk to Bartels. Karl had itched their main halyards on to the windlass and was inding at it in an acharnement of industry, his shock ead jerking and his grubby face perspiring. Then the ck gates opened; and so, in a Babel of shouting, whin-ng of blocks, and creaking of spars, our whole company as split out into the dingy bosom of the Elbe. The ohannes gathered way under wind and tide and headed or midstream. A last shake of the hand, and Bartels eluctantly slipped the head-rope and we drifted apart.
Gute Reise! Gute Reise!" It was no time for reretful gazing, for the flood-tide was sweeping us up nd out, and it was not until we had set the foresail, dged into a shallow bight, and let go our anchor, that e had leisure to think of him again; but by that ime his and the other craft were shades in the murky ast.

We swung close to a glacis of smooth blue mud which loped up to a weed-grown dyke; behind lay the same flat ountry, colourless, humid; and opposite us, two miles way, scarcely visible in the deepening twilight, ran the utline of a similar shore. Between rolled the turgid lbe. "The Styx flowing through Tartarus," I thought
o myself, recalling some of our Baltic anchorages.

I told my news to Davies as soon as the anchor was own, instinctively leaving the sex of the inquirer to the st, as my informant had done.

"The Medusa called yesterday?" he interrupted.
And outward bound? That's a rum thing. Why idn't he inquire when he was going up?"

"It was a lady," and I drily retailed the official story, very busy with a deck-broom the while. "We're all square now, aren't we?" I ended. "I'll go below and light the stove."

Davies had been engaged in fixing up the riding-light When I last saw him he was still so engaged, but motionless, the lantern under his left arm, and his right hand grasping the forestay and the half-knotted lanyard, his eyes staring fixedly down the river, a strange look in his face, half exultant, half perplexed. When he joined me and spoke he seemed to be concluding a difficult argument.

"Anyway, it proves," he said, "that the Medusa has gone back to Norderney. That's the main thing."

"Probably," I agreed, "but let's sum up all we know. First, it's certain that nobody we've met as yet has any suspicion of us——"

"I told you he did it off his own bat," threw in Davies.

"Or, secondly, of him. If he's what you think it's not known here."

"I can't help that."

"Thirdly, he inquires for you on his way back from Hamburg, three weeks after the event. It doesn't look as if he thought he had disposed of you—it doesn't look as if he had meant to dispose of you. He sends his daughter, too—a curious proceeding under the circumstances. Perhaps it's all a mistake."

"It's not a mistake," said Davies, half to himself. "But did he send her? He'd have sent one of his men. He can't be on board at all."

This was a new light.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"He must have left the yacht when he got to Ham urg; some other devil's work, I suppose. She's being iled back now, and passing here——"

"Oh, I see! It's a private supplementary inquiry."

"That's a long name to call it."

"Would the girl sail back alone with the crew?"

"She's used to the sea—and perhaps she isn't alone. here was that stepmother—— But it doesn't make a a'porth of difference to our plans; we'll start on the ob to-morrow morning."

We were busier than usual that night, reckoning stores, dying lockers, and securing movables. "We must conomise," said Davies, for all the world as though we ere castaways on a raft. "It's a wretched thing to ave to land somewhere to buy oil," was a favourite bservation of his.

Before getting to sleep I was made to recognise a new actor in the conditions of navigation, now that the ideless Baltic was left behind us. A strong current was luicing past our sides, and at the eleventh hour I was urned out, clad in pyjamas and oilskins (a horrible ombination), to assist in running out a kedge or spare nchor.

"What's kedging off?" I asked, when we were tucked p again.

"Oh, it's when you run aground; you have to—but ou'll soon learn all about it." I steeled my heart for he morrow.

So behold us, then, at eight o'clock on October 5th, tanding down the river towards the field of our first abours. It is fifteen miles to the mouth; drab, dreary iles like the dullest reaches of the lower Thames; but cenery was of no concern to us, and a south-westerly reeze blowing out of a grey sky kept us constantly on the verge of reefing. The tide as it gathered strength swept us down with a force attested by the speed with which buoys came in sight, nodded above us and passed each boiling in its eddy of dirty foam. I scarcely noticed at first—so calm was the water, and so regular were the buoys, like milestones along a road—that the northern line of coast was rapidly receding and that the "river" was coming to be but a belt of deep water skirting a vast estuary, three—seven—ten miles broad till it merged in open sea.

"Why, we're at sea!" I suddenly exclaimed, "after an hour's sailing!"

"Just discovered that?" said Davies, laughing.

"You said it was fifteen miles," I complained.

"So it is, till we reach this coast at Cuxhaven; but I suppose you may say we're at sea; of course that's all sand over there to starboard. Look! some of it's showing already."

He pointed into the north. Looking more attentively I noticed that outside the line of buoys patches of the surface heaved and worked; in one or two places streaks and circles of white were forming; in the midst of one such circle a sleek mauve hump had risen, like the back of a sleeping whale. I saw that an old spell was enthralling Davies as his eye travelled away to the blank horizon. He scanned it all with a critical eagerness too, as one who looks for a new meaning in an old friend's face. Something of his zest was communicated to me and stilled the shuddering thrill that had seized me. The protecting land was still a comforting neighbour but our severance with it came quickly. The tide whirled us down, and our straining canvas aiding it we were soon off Cuxhaven, which crouched so low behind its mighty dyke, that of some of its houses only the chimneys were visible. Then, a mile or so on, the shore sharpened to a point like a claw, where the innocent dyke became a long, low fort, with some great guns peeping over; then of a sudden it ceased, retreating into the far south in a dim perspective of groins and dunes.

We spun out into the open and leant heavily over to the now unobstructed wind. The yacht rose and sank to a little swell, but my first impression was one of wonder at the calmness of the sea, for the wind blew fresh and free from horizon to horizon.

"Why, it's all sand there now, and we're under the lee of it," said Davies, with an enthusiastic sweep of his hand over the sea on our left, or port, hand. "That's our hunting ground."

"What are we going to do?" I inquired.

"Pick up Sticker's Gat," was the reply. "It ought to be near Buoy K."

A red buoy with a huge K on it soon came into view. Davies peered over to port.

"Just pull up the centre-board, will you?" he remarked, abstractedly, adding, "and hand me up the glasses as you're down there."

"Never mind the glasses. I've got it now; come to the main-sheet," was the next remark.

He put down the helm and headed the yacht straight for the troubled and discoloured expanse which covered the submerged sands. A "sleeping whale," with a light surf splashing on it, was right in our path.

"Stand by the lead, will you?" said Davies, politely. "I'll manage the sheets, it's a dead beat in. Ready about!"

The wind was in our teeth now, and for a crowde half-hour we wormed ourselves forward by ever-shorter ing tacks into the sinuous recesses of a channel whic threaded the shallows westward. I knelt in a tangle line, and, under the hazy impression that somethin very critical was going on, plied the lead furiously bumping and splashing myself, and shouting out th depths, which lessened steadily, with a great sense the importance of my function. Davies never seeme to listen, but tacked on imperturbably, juggling with th tiller, the sheets, and the chart, in a way that made or giddy to look at. For all our zeal we seemed to b making very slow progress.

"It's no use, tide's too strong; we must chance it, he said at last.

"Chance what?" I wondered to myself. Our tac suddenly began to grow longer, and the depths, whic I registered, shallower. All went well for some tim though, and we made better progress. Then came longer reach than usual.

"Two and a half—two—one and a half—one—on five feet," I gasped, reproachfully. The water w growing thick and frothy.

"It doesn't matter if we do," said Davies, thinkin aloud. "There's an eddy here, and it's a pity to was it—ready about! Back the jib!"

But it was too late. The yacht answered but faint to the helm, stopped, and heeled heavily over, wallo ing and grinding. Davies had the mainsail down in twinkling; it half smothered me as I crouched on th lee-side among my tangled skeins of line, scared an helpless. I crawled out from the folds, and saw hi standing by the mast in a reverie.

"It's not much use," he said, "on a falling tide, but re'll try kedging off. Pay that warp out while I run ut the kedge."

Like lightning he had cast off the dinghy's painter, umbled the kedge-anchor and himself into the dinghy, ulled out fifty yards into the deeper water, and heaved ut the anchor.

"Now haul," he shouted.

I hauled, beginning to see what kedging-off meant.

"Steady on! Don't sweat yourself," said Davies, umping aboard again.

"It's coming," I spluttered, triumphantly.

"The warp is, the yacht isn't; you're dragging the nchor home. Never mind, she'll lie well here. Let's ave lunch."

The yacht was motionless, and the water round her isibly lower. Petulant waves slapped against her sides, ut, scattered as my senses were, I realised that there as no vestige of danger. Round us the whole face of he waters was changing from moment to moment, hitening in some places, yellowing in others, where readths of sand began to be exposed. Close on our ght the channel we had left began to look like a turbid ttle river; and I understood why our progress had been o slow when I saw its current racing back to meet the lbe. Davies was already below, laying out a more han usually elaborate lunch, in high content of mind.

"Lies quiet, doesn't she?" he remarked. "If you o want a sit-down lunch, there's nothing like running ground for it. And, anyhow, we're as handy for work ere as anywhere else. You'll see."

Like most landsmen I had a wholesome prejudice gainst "running aground," so that my mentor's turn for breezy paradox was at first rather exasperating After lunch the large scale chart of the estuaries wa brought down, and we pored over it together, mappin out work for the next few days. There is no need t tire the general reader with its intricacies, nor is ther space to reproduce it for the benefit of the instructe reader. For both classes the general map should b sufficient, taken with the large scale fragment (Char

A), which gives a fair example of the region in detai
It will be seen that the three broad fairways of th Jade, Weser, and Elbe split up the sands into two mai groups. The westernmost of these is symmetrical in out line, an acute-angled triangle, very like a sharp steel-sho pike, if you imagine the peninsula from which it spring to be the wooden haft. The other is a huge congerie of banks, its base resting on the Hanover coast, two o its sides tolerably clean and even, and the third, tha facing the north-west, ribboned and lacerated by th fury of the sea, which has eaten out deep cavities an struck hungry tentacles far into the interior. The whol resembles an inverted E, or, better still, a rude fork on whose three deadly prongs, the Scharhorn Reef, th Knecht Sand, and the Tegeler Flat, as on the no les deadly point of the pike, many a good ship splinter herself in northerly gales. Following this simile, th Hohenhörn bank, where Davies was wrecked, is one o those that lie between the upper and middle prongs.

Our business was to explore the Pike and the For and the channels which ramify through them. I use th general word " channel," but in fact they differ widel in character, and are called in German by various names Balje, Gat, Loch, Diep, Rinne. For my purpose I nee only divide them into two sorts—those which hav water in them at all states of the tide, and those which have not, which dry off, that is, either wholly or partly at low-tide.

Davies explained that the latter would take most learning, and were to be our chief concern, because they were the "through-routes"—the connecting links between the estuaries. You can always detect them on the chart by rows of little Y-shaped strokes denoting "booms," that is to say, poles or saplings fixed in the sand to mark the passage. The strokes, of course, are only conventional signs, and do not correspond in the least to individual "booms," which are far too numerous and complex to be indicated accurately on a chart, even of the largest scale. The same applies to the course of the channels themselves, whose minor meanderings cannot be reproduced.

It was on the edge of one of these tidal swatchways that the yacht was now lying. It is called Sticker's Gat, and you cannot miss it (Chart A) if you carry your eye westward along our course from Cuxhaven. It was, so Davies told me, the last and most intricate stage of the "short cut" which the Medusa had taken on that memorable day—a stage he himself had never reached. Discussion ended, we went on deck, Davies arming himself with a notebook, binoculars, and the prismatic compass, whose use—to map the angles of the channels—was at last apparent. This is what I saw when we emerged.

CHAPTER XII

MY INITIATION

THE yacht lay with a very slight heel (thanks to a pair of small bilge-keels on her bottom) in a sort of trough

she had dug for herself, so that she was still ringed wi a few inches of water, as it were with a moat.

For miles in every direction lay a desert of sand. T the north it touched the horizon, and was only broke by the blue dot of Neuerk Island and its lighthous
To the east it seemed also to stretch to infinity, but th smoke of a steamer showed where it was pierced b the stream of the Elbe. To the south it ran up to th pencil-line of the Hanover shore. Only to the west wa its outline broken by any vestiges of the sea it had rise from. There it was astir with crawling white filament knotted confusedly at one spot in the north-west, when came a sibilant murmur like the hissing of many snake Desert as I call it, it was not entirely featureless. I colour varied from light fawn, where the highest leve had dried in the wind, to brown or deep violet, whe it was still wet, and slate-grey where patches of mu soiled its clean bosom. Here and there were pools water, smitten into ripples by the impotent wind; he and there it was speckled by shells and seaweed. An close to us, beginning to bend away towards that hissi knot in the north-west, wound our poor little channe mercilessly exposed as a stagnant, muddy ditch wi scarcely a foot of water, not deep enough to hide o small kedge-anchor, which perked up one fluke in in pudent mockery. The dull, hard sky, the wind moanin in the rigging as though crying in despair for a prey th had escaped it, made the scene inexpressibly forlorn.

Davies scanned it with gusto for a moment, climbe to a point of vantage on the boom, and swept his glass to and fro along the course of the channel.

"Fairly well boomed," he said, meditatively, "b one or two are very much out. By Jove! that's ticky bend there." He took a bearing with the com-ass, made a note or two, and sprang with a vigorous ap down on to the sand.

This, I may say, was the only way of "going ashore" hat he really liked. We raced off as fast as our clumsy ea-boots would let us, and followed up the course of ur channel to the west, reconnoitring the road we hould have to follow when the tide rose.

"The only way to learn a place like this," he shouted, is to see it at low water. The banks are dry then, and he channels are plain. Look at that boom"—he topped and pointed contemptuously—"it's all out of lace. I suppose the channel's shifted there. It's just t an important bend too. If you took it as a guide hen the water was up you'd run aground."

"Which would be very useful," I observed.

"Oh, hang it!" he laughed, "we're exploring. I ant to be able to run through this channel without a istake. We will, next time." He stopped, and plied ompass and notebook. Then we raced on till the next alt was called.

"Look," he said, "the channel's getting deeper, it as nearly dry a moment ago; see the current in it ow? That's the flood tide coming up—from the west, ind you; that is, from the Weser side. That shows e're past the watershed."

"Watershed?" I repeated, blankly.

"Yes, that's what I call it. You see, a big sand such this is like a range of hills dividing two plains, it's ever dead flat though it looks it; there's always one oint, one ridge, rather, where it's highest. Now a hannel cutting right through the sand is, of course, ways at its shallowest when it's crossing this ridge; at low water it's generally dry there, and it gradually deepens as it gets nearer to the sea on either side. Now at high tide, when the whole sand is covered, the water can travel where it likes; but directly the ebb sets in the water falls away on either side the ridge and the channel becomes two rivers flowing in opposite directions from the centre, or watershed, as I call it. So, also, when the ebb has run out and the flood begins, the channel is fed by two currents flowing to the centre and meeting in the middle. Here the Elbe and the Weser are our two feeders. Now this current here is going eastward; we know by the time of day that the tide's rising, therefore the watershed is between us and the yacht."

"Why is it so important to know that?"

"Because these currents are strong, and you want to know when you'll lose a fair one and strike a foul one. Besides, the ridge is the critical point when you're crossing on a falling tide, and you want to know when you're past it."

We pushed on till our path was barred by a big lagoon. It looked far more imposing than the channel; but Davies, after a rapid scrutiny, treated it to a grunt of contempt.

"It's a cul de sac," he said. "See that hump of sand it's making for, beyond?"

"It's boomed," I remonstrated, pointing to a decrepit stem drooping over the bank, and shaking a palsied finger at the imposture.

"Yes, that's just where one goes wrong, it's an old cut that's silted up. That boom's a fraud; there's no time to go further, the flood's making fast. I'll just take bearings of what we can see."

The false lagoon was the first of several that began to be visible in the west, swelling and joining hands over the ribs of sand that divided them. All the time the distant hissing grew nearer and louder, and a deep, thunderous note began to sound beneath it. We turned our backs to the wind and hastened back towards the Dulcibella, the stream in our channel hurrying and rising alongside of us.

"There's just time to do the other side," said Davies, when we reached her, and I was congratulating myself on having regained our base without finding our communications cut. And away we scurried in the direction we had come that morning, splashing through pools and jumping the infant runnels that were stealing out through rifts from the mother-channel as the tide rose. Our observations completed, back we travelled, making a wide circuit over higher ground to avoid the encroaching flood, and wading shin-deep in the final approach to the yacht.

As I scrambled thankfully aboard, I seemed to hear a far-off voice saying, in languid depreciation of yachting, that it did not give one enough exercise. It was mine, centuries ago, in another life. From east and west two sheets of water had overspread the desert, each pushing out tongues of surf that met and fused.

I waited on deck and watched the death-throes of the suffocating sands under the relentless onset of the sea. The last strongholds were battered, stormed, and overwhelmed; the tumult of sounds sank and steadied, and the sea swept victoriously over the whole expanse. The Dulcibella, hitherto contemptuously inert, began to wake and tremble under the buffetings she received. Then, with an effort, she jerked herself on to an even keel and bumped and strained fretfully, impatient to vanquish this insolent invader and make him a slave for her own ends. Soon her warp tightened and her nose swung slowly round; only her stern bumped now, and that with decreasing force. Suddenly she was free and drifting broadside to the wind till the anchor checked her and she brought up to leeward of it, rocking easily and triumphantly. Good-humoured little person! At heart she was friends alike with sand and sea. It was only when the old love and the new love were in mortal combat for her favours, and she was mauled in the fracas, that her temper rose in revolt.

We swallowed a hasty cup of tea, ran up the sails, and started off west again. Once across the "watershed" we met a strong current, but the trend of the passage was now more to the north-west, so that we could hold our course without tacking, and consequently could stem the tide. "Give her just a foot of the centre-plate," said Davies. "We know the way here, and she'll make less leeway; but we shall generally have to do without it—always on a falling tide. If you run aground with the plate down you deserve to be drowned." I now saw how valuable our walk had been. The booms were on our right; but they were broken reeds, giving no hint as to the breadth of the channel. A few had lost their tops, and were being engulfed altogether by the rising water. When we came to the point where they ceased, and the false lagoon had lain, I should have felt utterly lost. We had crossed the high and relatively level sands which form the base of the Fork, and were entering the labyrinth of detached banks which obstruct the funnel-shaped cavity between the upper and middle prongs. This I knew from the chart. My unaided eye saw nothing but the open sea, growing dark green as the depths increased; a dour, threatening sea, showing its white fangs. The waves grew longer and steeper, for the channels, though still tortuous, now begin to be broad and deep.

Davies had his bearings, and struck on his course confidently. "Now for the lead," he said; "the compass'll be little use soon. We must feel the edge of the sands till we pick up more booms."

"Where are we going to anchor for the night?" I asked.

"Under the Hohenhörn," said Davies, "for auld lang syne!"

Partly by sight and mostly by touch we crept round the outermost alley of the hidden maze till a new clump of booms appeared, meaningless to me, but analysed by him into two groups. One we followed for some distance, and then struck finally away and began another beat to windward.

Dusk was falling. The Hanover coast-line, never very distinct, had utterly vanished; an ominous heave of swell was underrunning the short sea. I ceased to attend to Davies imparting instruction on his beloved hobby, and sought to stifle in hard manual labour the dread that had been latent in me all day at the prospect of our first anchorage at sea.

"Sound, like blazes now!" he said at last. I came to a fathom and a half. "That's the bank," he said; "we'll give it a bit of a berth and then let go."

"Let go now!" was the order after a minute, and the chain ran out with a long-drawn moan. The Dulcibella snubbed up to it and jauntily faced the North Sea and the growing night.

"There we are!" said Davies, as we finished stowing the mainsail, "safe and snug in four fathoms in a magnificent sand-harbour, with no one to bother us and the whole of it to ourselves. No dues, no stinks, no traffic, no worries of any sort. It's better than a Baltic cove even, less beastly civilisation about. We're seven miles from the nearest coast, and five even from Neuerk—look, they're lighting up." There was a tiny spark in the east.

"I suppose it's all right," I said, "but I'd rather see a solid breakwater somewhere; it's a dirty-looking night, and I don't like this swell."

"The swell's nothing," said Davies; "it's only a stray drain from outside. As for breakwaters, you've got them all round you, only they're hidden. Ahead and to starboard is the West Hohenhörn, curling round to the sou'-west for all the world like a stone pier. You can hear the surf battering on its outside over to the north. That's where I was nearly wrecked that day, and the little channel I stumbled into must be quite near us somewhere. Half a mile away—to port there—is the East Hohenhörn, where I brought up, after dashing across this lake we're in. Another mile astern is the main body of the sands, the top prong of your fork. So you see we're shut in—practically. Surely you remember the chart? Why, it's——"

"Oh, confound the chart!" I broke out, finding this flow of plausible comfort too dismally suggestive for my nerves. "Look at it, man! Supposing anything happens—supposing it blows a gale! But it's no good shivering here and staring at the view. I'm going below."

There was a mauvais quart d'heure below, during which, I am ashamed to say, that I forgot the quest.

"Which soup do you feel inclined for?" said Davies, timidly, after a black silence of some minutes.

That simple remark, more eloquent of security than a thousand technical arguments, saved the situation.

"I say, Davies," I said, "I'm a white-livered cur at the best, and you mustn't spare me. But you're not like any yachtsman I ever met before, or any sailor of any sort. You're so casual and quiet in the extraordinary things you do. I believe I should like you better if you let fly a volley of deep-sea oaths sometimes, or threatened to put me in irons."

Davies opened wide eyes, and said it was all his fault for forgetting that I was not as used to such anchorages as he was. "And, by the way," he added, "as to its blowing a gale, I shouldn't wonder if it did; the glass is falling hard; but it can't hurt us. You see, even at high water the drift of the sea——"

"Oh, for Heaven's sake, don't begin again. You'll prove soon that we're safer here than in an hotel. Let's have dinner, and a thundering good one!"

Dinner ran a smooth course, but just as coffee was being brewed the hull, from pitching regularly, began to roll.

"I knew she would," said Davies. "I was going to warn you, only—the ebb has set in against the wind. It's quite safe——"

"I thought you said it would get calmer when the tide fell?"

"So it will, but it may seem rougher. Tides are queer things," he added, as though in defence of some not very respectable acquaintances.

He busied himself with his logbook, swaying easily to the motion of the boat; and I for my part tried to write up my diary, but I could not fix my attention. Every loose article in the boat became audibly restless. Cans clinked, cupboards rattled, lockers uttered hollow groans. Small things sidled out of dark hiding-places, and danced grotesque drunken figures on the floor, like goblins in a haunted glade. The mast whined dolorously at every heel, and the centre-board hiccoughed and choked. Overhead another horde of demons seemed to have been let loose. The deck and mast were conductors which magnified every sound and made the tap-tap of every rope's end resemble the blows of a hammer, and the slapping of the halyards against the mast the rattle of a Maxim gun. The whole tumult beat time to a rhythmical chorus which became maddening.

"We might turn in now," said Davies; "it's half-past ten."

"What, sleep through this?" I exclaimed. "I can't stand this, I must do something. Can't we go for another walk?"

I spoke in bitter, half-delirious jest.

"Of course we can," said Davies, "if you don't mind a bit of a tumble in the dinghy."

I reconsidered my rash suggestion, but it was too late now to turn back, and some desperate expedient was necessary I found myself on deck, gripping a backstay and looking giddily down and then up at the dinghy, as it bobbed like a cork in the trough of the sea alongside, while Davies settled the sculls and rowlocks.

"Jump!" he shouted, and before I could gather my wits and clutch the sides we were adrift in the night, reeling from hollow to hollow of the steep curling waves. Davies nursed our walnut-shell tenderly over their crests, edging her slantwise across their course. He used very little exertion, relying on the tide to carry us to our goal. Suddenly the motion ceased. A dark slope loomed up out of the night, and the dinghy rested softly in a shallow eddy.

"The West Hohenhörn," said Davies. We jumped out and sank into soft mud, hauled up the dinghy a foot or two, then mounted the bank and were on hard, wet sand. The wind leapt on us, and choked our voices.

"Let's find my channel," bawled Davies. "This way. Keep Neuerk light right astern of you."

We set off with a long, stooping stride in the teeth of the wind, and straight towards the roar of the breakers on the farther side of the sand. A line of Matthew Arnold's, "The naked shingles of the world," was running in my head. "Seven miles from land," I thought, "scuttling like sea-birds on a transient islet of sand, encircled by rushing tides and hammered by ocean, at midnight in a rising gale—cut off even from our one dubious refuge." It was the time, if ever, to conquer weakness. A mad gaiety surged through me as I drank the wind and pressed forward. It seemed but a minute or two and Davies clutched me.

"Look out!" he shouted. "It's my channel."

The ground sloped down, and a rushing river glimmered before us. We struck off at a tangent and followed its course to the north, stumbling in muddy rifts, slipping on seaweed, beginning to be blinded by a fine salt spray, and deafened by the thunder of the ocean surf. The river broadened, whitened, roughened, gathered itself for the shock, was shattered, and dissolved in milky gloom. We wheeled away to the right, and splashed into yeasty froth. I turned my back to the wind, scooped the brine out of eyes, faced back and saw that our path was barred by a welter of surf. Davies's voice was in my ear and his arm was pointing seaward.

"This—is—about where—I—bumped first—worse then—nor'-west wind—this—is—nothing. Let's—go—right—round."

We galloped away with the wind behind us, skirting the line of surf. I lost all account of time and direction. Another sea barred our road, became another river as we slanted along its shore. Again we were in the teeth of that intoxicating wind. Then a point of light was swaying and flickering away to the left, and now we were checking and circling. I stumbled against something sharp—the dinghy's gunwale. So we had completed the circuit of our fugitive domain, that dream-island—nightmare island as I always remember it.

"You must scull, too," said Davies. "It's blowing hard now. Keep her nose up a little—all you know!"

We lurched along, my scull sometimes buried to the thwart, sometimes striking at the bubbles of a wave top. Davies, in the bows, said "Pull!" or "Steady!" at intervals. I heard the scud smacking against his oil-skin back. Then a wan, yellow light glanced over the waves. "Easy! Let her come!" and the bowsprit of the Dulcibella, swollen to spectral proportions, was stabbing the darkness above me. "Back a bit! Two good strokes. Ship your scull! Now jump!" I clawed at the tossing hull and landed in a heap. Davies followed with the painter, and the dinghy swept astern.

"She's riding beautifully now," said he, when he had secured the painter. "There'll be no rolling on the flood, and it's nearly low water."

I don't think I should have cared, however much she had rolled. I was finally cured of funk.

It was well that I was, for to be pitched out of your bunk on to wet oil-cloth is a disheartening beginning to a day. This happened about eight o'clock. The yacht was pitching violently, and I crawled on all fours into the cabin, where Davies was setting out breakfast on the floor.

"I let you sleep on," he said; "we can't do anything till the water falls. We should never get the anchor up in this sea. Come and have a look round. It's clearing now," he went on, when we were crouching low on deck, gripping cleats for safety. "Wind's veered to nor'-west. It's been blowing a full gale, and the sea is at its worst now—near high water. You'll never see worse than this."

I was prepared for what I saw—the stormy sea for leagues around, and a chaos of breakers where our dream-island had stood—and took it quietly, even with a sort of elation. The Dulcibella faced the storm as doggedly as ever, plunging her bowsprit into the sea and flinging green water over her bows. A wave of confidence and affection for her welled through me. I had been used to resent the weight and bulk of her unwieldy anchor and cable, but I saw their use now; varnish, paint, spotless decks, and snowy sails were foppish absurdities of a hateful past.

"What can we do to-day?" I asked.

"We must keep well inside the banks and be precious careful wherever there's a swell. It's rampant in here, you see, in spite of the barrier of sand. But there's plenty we can do further back."

We breakfasted in horrible discomfort; then smoked and talked till the roar of the breakers dwindled. At the first sign of bare sand we got under way, under mizzen and head-sails only, and I learned how to sail a reluctant anchor out of the ground. Pivoting round, we scudded east before the wind, over the ground we had traversed the evening before, while an archipelago of new banks slowly shouldered up above the fast weakening waves. We trod delicately among and around them, sounding and observing; heaving to where space permitted, and sometimes using the dinghy. I began to see where the risks lay in this sort of navigation. Wherever the ocean swell penetrated, or the wind blew straight down a long deep channel, we had to be very cautious and leave good margins. "That's the sort of place you mustn't ground on," Davies used to say.

In the end we traversed the Steil Sand again, but by a different swatchway, and anchored, after an arduous day, in a notch on its eastern limit, just clear of the swell that rolled in from the turbulent estuary of the Elbe. The night was fair, and when the tide receded we lay perfectly still, the fresh wind only sending a lip-lip of ripples against our sides.

CHAPTER XIII

THE MEANING OF OUR WORK

NOTHING happened during the next ten days to disturb us at our work. During every hour of daylight and many of darkness, sailing or anchored, aground or afloat, in rain and shine, wind and calm, we studied the bed of the estuaries, and practised ourselves in threading the network of channels; holding no communication with the land and rarely approaching it. It was a life of toil, exposure, and peril; a struggle against odds, too; for wild autumnal weather was the rule, with the wind backing and veering between the south-west and north-west, and only for two placid days blowing gently from the east, the safe quarter for this region. Its force and direction determined each fresh choice of ground. If it was high and northerly we explored the inner fastnesses; in moderate intervals the exterior fringe, darting when surprised into whatever lair was most convenient.

Sometimes we were tramping vast solitudes of sand, sometimes scudding across ephemeral tracts of shallow sea. Again, we were creeping gingerly round the deeper arteries that surround the Great Knecht, examining their convolutions as it were the veins of a living tissue, and the circulation of the tide throbbing through them like blood. Again, we would be staggering through the tide-rips and overfalls that infest the open fairway of the Weser on our passage between the Fork and the Pike. On one of our fine days I saw the scene of Davies's original adventure by daylight with the banks dry and the channels manifest. The reader has seen it on the chart, and can, up to a point, form his opinion; I can only add that I realised by ocular proof that no more fatal trap could have been devised for an innocent stranger; for approaching it from the north-west under the easiest conditions it was hard enough to verify our true course. In a period so full of new excitements it is not easy for me to say when we were hardest put to it, especially as it was a rule with Davies never to admit that we were in any danger at all. But I think that our ugliest experience was on the 10th, when, owing to some minute miscalculation, we stranded in a dangerous spot. Mere stranding, of course, was all in the day's work; the constantly recurring question being when and where to court or risk it. This time we were so situated that when the rising tide came again we were on a lee shore, broadside on to a gale of wind which was sending a nasty sea—with a three-mile drift to give it force—down Robin's Balje, which is one of the deeper arteries I spoke of above, and now lay dead to windward of us. The climax came about ten o'clock at night. "We can do nothing till she floats," said Davies; and I can see him now quietly smoking and splicing a chafed warp while he explained that her double skin of teak fitted her to stand anything in reason. She certainly had a terrific test that night, for the bottom was hard, unyielding sand, on which she rose and fell with convulsive vehemence. The last half-hour was for me one of almost intolerable tension. I spent it on deck unable to bear the suspense below. Sheets of driven sea flew bodily over the hull, and a score of times I thought she must succumb as she shivered to the blows of her keel on the sand. But those stout skins knit by honest labour stood the trial. One final thud and she wrenched herself bodily free, found her anchor, and rode clear.

On the whole I think we made few mistakes. Davies had a supreme aptitude for the work. Every hour, sometimes every minute, brought its problem, and his resource never failed. The stiffer it was the cooler he became. He had, too, that intuition which is independent of acquired skill, and is at the root of all genius; which, to take cases analogous to his own, is the last quality of the perfect guide or scout. I believe he could smell sand where he could not see or touch it.

As for me, the sea has never been my element, and never will be; nevertheless, I hardened to the life, grew salt, tough, and tolerably alert. As a soldier learns more in a week of war than in years of parades and pipeclay, so, cut off from all distractions, moving from bivouac to precarious bivouac, and depending, to some extent, for my life on my muscles and wits, I rapidly learnt my work and gained a certain dexterity. I knew my ropes in the dark, could beat economically to windward through squalls, take bearings, and estimate the interaction of wind and tide.

We were generally in solitude, but occasionally we met galliots like the Johannes tacking through the sands, and once or twice we found a fleet of such boats anchored in a gut, waiting for water. Their draught, loaded, was from six to seven feet, our own only four, without our centre-plate, but we took their mean draught as the standard of all our observations. That is, we set ourselves to ascertain when and how a vessel drawing six and a half feet could navigate the sands.

A word more as to our motive. It was Davies's conviction, as I have said, that the whole region would in war be an ideal hunting-ground for small free-lance marauders, and I began to know he was right; for look at the three sea-roads through the sands to Hamburg, Bremen, Wilhelmshaven, and the heart of commercial Germany. They are like highways piercing a mountainous district by defiles, where a handful of desperate men can arrest an army.

Follow the parallel of a war on land. People your mountains with a daring and resourceful race, who possess an intimate knowledge of every track and bridle-path, who operate in small bands, travel light, and move rapidly. See what an immense advantage such guerillas possess over an enemy which clings to beaten tracks, moves in large bodies, slowly, and does not "know the country." See how they can not only inflict disasters on a foe who vastly overmatches them in strength, but can prolong a semi-passive resistance long after all decisive battles have been fought. See, too, how the strong invader can only conquer his elusive antagonists by learning their methods, studying the country, and matching them in mobility and cunning. The parallel must not be pressed too far; but that this sort of warfare will have its counterpart on the sea is a truth which cannot be questioned.

Davies in his enthusiasm set no limits to its importance. The small boat in shallow waters played a mighty rôle in his vision of a naval war, a part that would grow in importance as the war developed and reach its height in the final stages.

"The heavy battle fleets are all very well," he used to say, "but if the sides are well matched there might be nothing left of them after a few months of war. They might destroy one another mutually, leaving as nominal conqueror an admiral with scarcely a battleship to bless himself with. It's then that the true struggle will set in; and it's then that anything that will float will be pressed into the service, and anybody who can steer a boat, knows his waters, and doesn't care the toss of a coin for his life, will have magnificent opportunities. It cuts both ways. What small boats can do in these waters is plain enough; but take our own case. Say we're beaten on the high seas by a coalition. There's then a risk of starvation or invasion. It's all rot what they talk about instant surrender. We can live on half-rations, recuperate, and build; but we must have time. Meanwhile our coast and ports are in danger, for the millions we sink in forts and mines won't carry us far. They're fixed—pure passive defence. What you want is boats—mosquitoes with stings—swarms of them—patrol-boats, scout-boats, torpedo-boats; intelligent irregulars manned by local men, with a pretty free hand to play their own game. And what a splendid game to play! There are places very like this over there—nothing half so good, but similar—the Mersey estuary, the Dee, the Severn, the Wash, and, best of all, the Thames, with all the Kent, Essex, and Suffolk banks round it. But as for defending our coasts in the way I mean—we've nothing ready—nothing whatsoever! We don't even build or use small torpedo-boats. These fast 'destroyers' are no good for this work—too long and unmanageable, and most of them too deep. What you want is something strong and simple, of light draught, and with only a spar-torpedo, if it came to that. Tugs, launches, small yachts—anything would do at a pinch, for success would depend on intelligence, not on brute force or complicated mechanism. They'd get wiped out often, but what matter? There'd be no lack of the right sort of men for them if the thing was organised. But where are the men?

"Or, suppose we have the best of it on the high seas, and have to attack or blockade a coast like this, which is sand from end to end. You can't improvise people who are at home in such waters. The navy chaps don't learn it, though, by Jove! they're the most magnificent service in the world—in pluck, and nerve, and everything else. They'll try anything, and often do the impossible. But their boats are deep, and they get little practice in this sort of thing."

Davies never pushed home his argument here; but

I know that it was the passionate wish of his heart, somehow and somewhere, to get a chance of turning his knowledge of this coast to practical account in the war that he felt was bound to come, to play that " splendid game " in this, the most fascinating field for it.

I can do no more than sketch his views. Hearing them as I did, with the very splash of the surf and the bubble of the tides in my ears, they made a profound impression on me, and gave me the very zeal for our work he, by temperament, possessed.

But as the days passed and nothing occurred to disturb us, I felt more and more strongly that, as regards our quest, we were on the wrong tack. We found nothing suspicious, nothing that suggested a really adequate motive for Dollmann's treachery. I became impatient, and was for pushing on more quickly westward. Davies still clung to his theory, but the same feeling influenced him.

" It's something to do with these channels in the sand," he persisted, " but I'm afraid, as you say, we haven't got at the heart of the mystery. Nobody seems to care a rap what we do. We haven't done the estuaries as well as I should like, but we'd better push on to the islands. It's exactly the same sort of work, and just as important, I believe. We're bound to get a clue soon."

There was also the question of time, for me at least I was due to be back in London, unless I obtained an extension, on the 28th, and our present rate of progress was slow. But I cannot conscientiously say that I made a serious point of this. If there was any value in our enterprise at all, official duty paled beside it. The machinery of State would not suffer from my absence excuses would have to be made, and the results braved.

All the time our sturdy little craft grew shabbier and more weather-worn, the varnish thinner, the decks greyer, the sails dingier, and the cabin roof more murky where stove-fumes stained it. But the only beauty she ever possessed, that of perfect fitness for her functions, remained. With nothing to compare her to she became home to me. My joints adapted themselves to her cramped limits, my tastes and habits to her plain domestic economy.

But oil and water were running low, and the time had come for us to be forced to land and renew our stock.

CHAPTER XIV

THE FIRST NIGHT IN THE ISLANDS

A LOW line of sandhills, pink and fawn in the setting sun, at one end of them a little white village huddled round the base of a massive four-square lighthouse—such was Wangeroog, the easternmost of the Frisian Islands, as I saw it on the evening of October 15th. We had decided to make it our first landing-place; and since it possesses no harbour, and is hedged by a mile of sand at low water, we had run in on the rising tide till the yacht grounded, in order to save ourselves as much labour as possible in the carriage to and fro of the heavy water-breakers and oil-cans which we had to replenish. In faint outline three miles to the south of us was the flat plain of Friesland, broken only by some trees, a windmill or two, and a church spire. Between, the shallow expanse of sea was already beginning to shrink away into lagoons, chief among which was the narrow passage by which we had approached from the east. This continued its course west, directly parallel to the island, and in it, at a distance of half a mile from us, three galliots lay at anchor.

Before supper was over the yacht was high and dry, and when we had eaten, Davies loaded himself with cans and breakers. I was for taking my share, but he induced me to stay aboard; for I was dead tired after an unusually long and trying day, which had begun at 2 a.m., when, using a precious instalment of east wind, we had started on a complete passage of the sands from the Elbe to the Jade. It was a barely possible feat for a boat of our low speed to perform in only two tides; and though we just succeeded, it was only by dint of tireless vigilance and severe physical strain.

"Lay out the anchor when you've had a smoke," said Davies, "and keep an eye on the riding-light; it's my only guide back."

He lowered himself, and I heard the scrunch of his sea-boots as he disappeared in the darkness. It was a fine starry night, with a touch of frost in the air. I lit a cigar, and stretched myself on a sofa close to the glow of the stove. The cigar soon languished and dropped, and I dozed uneasily, for the riding-light was on my mind. I got up once and squinted at it through the half-raised skylight, saw it burning steadily, and lay down again. The cabin lamp wanted oil and was dying down to a red-hot wick, but I was too drowsy to attend to it, and it went out. I lit my cigar stump again, and tried to keep awake by thinking. It was the first time I and Davies had been separated for so long; yet so used had we grown to freedom from interference that this would not have disturbed me in the least were it not for a sudden presentiment that on this first night o he second stage of our labours something would happen. ll at once I heard a sound outside, a splashing footstep s of a man stepping in a puddle. I was wide awake n an instant, but never thought of shouting "Is that ou, Davies?" for I knew in a flash that it was not he. t was the slip of a stealthy man. Presently I heard nother footstep—the pad of a boot on the sand—this ime close to my ear, just outside the hull; then some nore, fainter and further aft. I gently rose and peered ft through the skylight. A glimmer of light, reflected rom below, was wavering over the mizzen-mast and umpkin; it had nothing to do with the riding-light, vhich hung on the forestay. My prowler, I understood, ad struck a match and was reading the name on the tern. How much further would his curiosity carry im? The match went out, and footsteps were audible gain. Then a strong, guttural voice called in German, Yacht ahoy!" I kept silence. "Yacht ahoy!" a ttle louder this time. A pause, and then a vibration f the hull as boots scraped on it and hands grasped the unwale. My visitor was on deck. I bobbed down, at on the sofa, and I heard him moving along the deck, uickly and confidently, first forward to the bows, where e stopped, then back to the companion amidships. nside the cabin it was pitch dark, but I heard his boots n the ladder, feeling for the steps. In another moment e would be in the doorway lighting his second match. urely it was darker than before? There had been a ttle glow from the riding-lamp reflected on to the sky- ght, but it had disappeared. I looked up, realised, and ade a fool of myself. In a few seconds more I should ave seen my visitor face to face, perhaps had an inter- iew; but I was new to this sort of work and lost my head. All I thought of was Davies's last words, an saw him astray on the sands, with no light to guid him back, the tide rising, and a heavy load. I starte up involuntarily, bumped against the table, and set th stove jingling. A long step and a grab at the ladde but just too late! I grasped something damp and greasy there was tugging and hard breathing, and I was le clasping a big sea-boot, whose owner I heard jump o to the sand and run. I scrambled out, vaulted ove board, and followed blindly by the sound. He ha doubled round the bows of the yacht, and I did th same, ducked under the bowsprit, forgetting the bobstay and fell violently on my head, with all the wind knocke out of me by a wire rope and block whose strength an bulk was one of the glories of the Dulcibella. I struggle on as soon as I got some breath, but my invisible quarr was far ahead. I pulled off my heavy boots, carrie them, and ran in my stockings, promptly cutting m foot on some cockle-shells. Pursuit was hopeless, an a final stumble over a bit of driftwood sent me sprawlin with agony in my toes.

Limping back, I decided that I had made a ver poor beginning as an active adventurer. I had gaine nothing, and lost a great deal of breath and skin, an did not even know for certain where I was. The yacht' light was extinguished, and, even with Wangeroog Light house to guide me, I found it no easy matter to fin her. She had no anchor out, if the tide rose. And hov was Davies to find her? After much feeble circlin I took to lying flat at intervals in the hopes of seein her silhouetted against the starry sky. This plan suc ceeded at last, and with relief and humility I boarde her, relit the riding-light, and carried out the kedg nchor. The strange boot lay at the foot of the ladder, ut it told no tales when I examined it. It was eleven 'clock, past low water. Davies was cutting it fine if e was to get aboard without the dinghy's help. But ventually he reappeared in the most prosaic way, exausted with his heavy load, but full of talk about his isit ashore. He began while we were still on deck.

"Look here, we ought to have settled more about hat we're to say when we're asked questions. I chose quiet-looking shop, but it turned out to be a sort of n, where they were drinking pink gin—all very friendly, s usual, and I found myself under a fire of questions. said we were on our way back to England. There was he usual rot about the smallness of the boat, etc. It truck me that we should want some other pretence for oing so slow and stopping to explore, so I had to bring n the ducks, though goodness knows we don't want to vaste time over them. The subject wasn't quite a success. They said it was too early—jealous, I suppose; but then wo fellows spoke up, and asked to be taken on to help. Said they would bring their punt; without local help we hould do no good. All true enough, no doubt, but what nuisance they'd be. I got out of it——"

"It's just as well you did," I interposed. "We shall ever be able to leave the boat by herself. I believe ve're watched," and I related my experience.

"H'm! It's a pity you didn't see who it was. Confound that bobstay!" (his tactful way of reflecting on ny clumsiness); "which way did he run?" I pointed vaguely into the west. "Not towards the island? I vonder if it's someone off one of those galliots. There re three anchored in the channel over there; you can ee their lights. You didn't hear a boat pulling off?"

I explained that I had been a miserable failure as a detective.

"You've done jolly well, I think," said Davies. "If you had shouted when you first heard him we should know less still. And we've got a boot, which may come in useful. Anchor out all right? Let's get below."

We smoked and talked till the new flood, lapping softly round the Dulcibella, raised her without a jar.

Of course, I argued, there might be nothing in it. The visitor might have been a commonplace thief; an apparently deserted yacht was a tempting bait. Davies scouted this possibility from the first.

"They're not like that in Germany," he said. "In Holland, if you like, they'll do anything. And I don't like that turning out of the lantern to gain time, if we were away."

Nor did I. In spite of my blundering in details, I welcomed the incident as the first concrete proof that the object of our quest was no mare's nest. The next point was what was the visitor's object? If to search, what would he have found?

"The charts, of course, with all our corrections and notes, and the log. They'd give us away," was Davies's instant conclusion. Not having his faith in the channel theory, I was lukewarm about his precious charts.

"After all, we're doing nothing wrong, as you've often said yourself," I said.

Still, as a true index to our mode of life they were the only things on board that could possibly compromise us or suggest that we were anything more than eccentric young Englishmen cruising for sport (witness the duck guns) and pleasure. We had two sets of charts, German and English. The former we decided to use in practice, and to hide, together with the log, if occasion demanded. My diary, I resolved, should never leave my person. Then there were the naval books. Davies scanned them with a look I knew well.

"There are too many of them," he said, in the tone of a cook fixing the fate of superfluous kittens. "Let's throw them overboard. They're very old anyhow, and I know them by heart."

"Well, not here!" I protested, for he was laying greedy hands on the shelf; "they'll be found at low water. In fact, I should leave them as they are. You had them when you were here before, and Dollmann knows you had them. If you return without them, it will look queer." They were spared.

The English charts, being relatively useless, though more suitable to our rôle as English yachtsmen, were to be left in evidence, as shining proofs of our innocence. It was all delightfully casual, I could not help thinking. A seven-ton yacht does not abound in (dry) hiding-places, and we were helpless against a drastic search. If there were secrets on this coast to guard, and we were suspected as spies, there was nothing to prevent an official visit and warning. There need be no prowlers scuttling off when alarmed, unless indeed it was thought wisest to let well alone, if we were harmless, and not to arouse suspicions where there were none. Here we lost ourselves in conjecture. Whose agent was the prowler? If Dollmann's, did Dollmann know now that the Dulcibella was safe, and back in the region he had expelled her from? If so, was he likely to return to the policy of violence? We found ourselves both glancing at the duck guns strung up under the racks, and then we both laughed and looked foolish. " A war of wits, and not o duck guns," I opined. " Let's look at the chart."

The reader is already familiar with the general aspec of this singular region, and I need only remind him tha the mainland is that district of Prussia which is know as East Friesland.* It is a short, flat-topped peninsula bounded on the west by the Ems estuary and beyon that by Holland, and on the east by the Jade estuary a low-lying country, containing great tracts of mars and heath, and few towns of any size; on the nort side none. Seven islands lie off the coast. All, excep Borkum, which is round, are attenuated strips, slightl crescent-shaped, rarely more than a mile broad, an tapering at the ends; in length averaging about si miles, from Norderney and Juist, which are seven an nine respectively, to little Baltrum, which is only tw and a half.

Of the shoal spaces which lie between them and th mainland, two thirds dry at low-water, and the remainin third becomes a system of lagoons whose distributio is controlled by the natural drift of the North Sea as i forces its way through the intervals between the islands Each of these intervals resembles the bar of a river and is obstructed by dangerous banks, over which th sea pours at every tide scooping out a deep pool. Thi fans out and ramifies to east and west as the pent-u current frees itself, encircles the islands, and spread over the intervening flats. But the further it penetrate the less coursing force it has, and as a result no islan is girt completely by a low-water channel. About mid way at the back of each of them is a " watershed," onl covered for five or six hours out of the twelve. A boat even of the lightest draught, navigating behind the islands must choose its moment for passing these. As to navigability, the "North Sea Pilot" sums up the matter in these dry terms: "The channels dividing these islands from each other and the shore afford to the small craft of the country the means of communication between the Ems and the Jade, to which description of vessels only they are available." The islands are dismissed with a brief note or two about beacons and lights.

* See Map B.

The more I looked at the chart the more puzzled I became. The islands were evidently mere sandbanks, with a cluster of houses and a church on each, the only hint of animation in their desolate ensemble being the occasional word "Bade-strand," suggesting that they were visited in the summer months by a handful of townsfolk for the sea-bathing. Norderney, of course, was conspicuous in this respect; but even its town, which I know by repute as a gay and fashionable watering-place, would be dead and empty for some months in the year, and could have no commercial importance. No man could do anything on the mainland coast—a monotonous line of dyke punctuated at intervals by an infinitesimal village. Glancing idly at the names of these villages, I noticed that they most of them ended in siel—a repulsive termination, that seemed appropriate to the whole region. There were Carolinensiel, Bensersiel, etc. Siel means either a sewer or a sluice, the latter probably in this case, for I noticed that each village stood at the outlet of a little stream which evidently carried off the drainage of the lowlands behind. A sluice, or lock, would be necessary at the mouth, for at high tide the land is below the level of the sea. Looking next at the sands outside, I noticed that across them and towards each outlet a line of booms was marked, showing that there was some sort of tidal approach to the village, evidently formed by the scour of the little stream.

"Are we going to explore those?" I asked Davies.

"I don't see the use," he answered; "they only lead to those potty little places. I suppose local galliots use them."

"How about your torpedo-boats and patrol-boats?"

"They might, at certain tides. But I can't see what value they'd be, unless as a refuge for a German boat in the last resort. They lead to no harbours. Wait! There's a little notch in the dyke at Neuharlingersiel and Dornumersiel, which may mean some sort of a quay arrangement, but what's the use of that?"

"We may as well visit one or two, I suppose?"

"I suppose so; but we don't want to be playing round villages. There's heaps of really important work to do, further out."

"Well, what do you make of this coast?"

Davies had nothing but the same old theory, but he urged it with a force and keenness that impressed me more deeply than ever.

"Look at those islands!" he said. "They're clearly the old line of coast, hammered into breaches by the sea. The space behind them is like an immense tidal harbour, thirty miles by five, and they screen it impenetrably. It's absolutely made for shallow war-boats under skilled pilotage. They can nip in and out of the gaps, and dodge about from end to end. On one side is the Ems, on the other the big estuaries. It's a perfect base for torpedo-craft."

I agreed (and agree still), but still I shrugged my shoulders.

"We go on exploring, then, in the same way?"

"Yes; keeping a sharp look-out, though. Remember, we shall always be in sight of land now."

"What's the glass doing?"

"Higher than for a long time. I hope it won't bring fog. I know this district is famous for fogs, and fine weather at this time of the year is bad for them anywhere. I would rather it blew, if it wasn't for exploring those gaps, where an on-shore wind would be nasty. Six-thirty to-morrow; not later. I think I'll sleep in the saloon for the future, after what happened to-night."

CHAPTER XV

BENSERSIEL *

THE decisive incidents of our cruise were now fast approaching. Looking back on the steps that led to them, and anxious that the reader should be wholly with us in our point of view, I think I cannot do better than give extracts from my diary of the next three days:—

"Oct. 16th (up at 6.30, yacht high and dry). Of the three galliots out at anchor in the channel yesterday, only one is left. . . . I took my turn with the breakers this morning and walked to Wangeroog, whose village I found half lost in sand drifts, which are planted with tufts of marram-grass in mathematical rows, to give stability and prevent a catastrophe like that at Pompeii. A friendly grocer told me all there is to know, which is little. The islands are what we thought them—barre for the most part, with a small fishing population, an a scanty accession of summer visitors for bathing. Th season is over now, and business slack for him. Ther is still, however, a little trade with the mainland i galliots and lighters, a few of which come from th 'siels' on the mainland. 'Had these harbours?' asked. 'Mud-holes!' he replied, with a contemptuou laugh. (He is a settler in these wilds, not a native Said he had heard of schemes for improving them, so a to develop the islands as health-resorts, but thought i was only a wild speculation.

* For this chapter see Map B.

"A heavy tramp back to the yacht, nearly crushed b impedimenta. While Davies made yet another trip, stalked some birds with a gun, and obtained what re sembled a specimen of the smallest variety of jack-snipe and small at that; but I made a great noise, which hope persuaded somebody of the purity of our motives.

"We weighed anchor at one o'clock, and in passin the anchored galliot took a good look at her. Kormora was on her stern; otherwise she was just like a hundre others. Nobody was on deck.

"We spent the whole afternoon till dark explorin the Harle, or gap between Wangeroog and Spiekeroog the sea breaking heavily on the banks outside. . . . Fin as the day was, the scene from the offing was desolat to the last degree. The naked spots of the two island are hideous in their sterility: melancholy bits of wreck wood their only relief, save for one or two grotesqu beacons, and, most bizarre of all, a great church-towe standing actually in the water, on the north side o Wangeroog; a striking witness to the encroachment o the sea. On the mainland, which was barely visibl here was one very prominent landmark, a spire, which rom the chart we took to be that of Esens, a town four niles inland.

"The days are growing short. Sunset is soon after ve, and an hour later it is too dark to see booms and uoys distinctly. The tides also are awkward just now.* High-water at morning and evening is between five and ix—just at twilight. For the night, we groped with he lead into the Muschel Balge, the tributary channel which laps round the inside of Spiekeroog, and lay in wo fathoms, clear of the outer swell, but rolling a little when the ebb set in strong against the wind.

"A galliot passed us, going west, just as we were towing sails; too dark to see her name. Later, we saw her anchor-light higher up our channel.

"The great event of the day has been the sighting of a small German gunboat, steaming slowly west along the coast. That was about half-past four, when we were sounding along the Harle.

"Davis identified her at once as the Blitz, Commander von Brüning's gunboat. We wondered if he recognised the Dulcibella, but, anyway, she seemed to take no notice of us and steamed slowly on. We quite expected to fall in with her when we came to the islands, but the actual sight of her has excited us a good deal. She is an ugly, cranky little vessel, painted grey, with one funnel. Davis is contemptuous about her low freeboard forward; says he would rather go to sea in the Dulce. He has her dimensions and armament (learnt from Brassey) at his fingers' ends: one hundred and forty feet by twenty-five, one 4.9 gun, one 3.4, and four maxims—an old type. Just going to bed; a bitterly cold night.

* I exclude all the technicalities that I can, but the reader should take note that the tide-table is very important henceforward.

"Oct. 17th.—Glass falling heavily this morning, to our great disgust. Wind back in the S.W. and much warmer. Starting at 5.30, we tacked on the tide over the 'water-shed' behind Spiekeroog. So did the galliot we had seen last night, but we again missed identifying her, as she weighed anchor before we came up to her berth. Davies, however, swore she was the Kormoran. We lost sight of her altogether for the greater part of the day which we spent in exploring the Otzumer Ee (the gap between Langeoog and Spiekeroog), now and then firing some perfunctory shots at seals and sea-birds . . (nautical details omitted). . . . In the evening we were hurrying back to an inside anchorage, when we made a bad mistake; did, in fact, what we had never done before, ran aground on the very top of high water, and are now sitting hard and fast on the edge of the Rute Flat, south of the east spit of Langeoog. The light was bad, and a misplaced boom tricked us; kedging-off failed, and at 8 p.m. we were left on a perfect Ararat of sand, and only a yard or two from that accursed boom which is perched on the very summit, as a lure to the unwary. It is going to blow hard too, though that is no great matter, as we are sheltered by banks on the sou'-west and nor'-west sides, the likely quarters. We hope to float at 6.15 to-morrow morning, but to make sure of being able to get her off, we have been transferring some ballast to the dinghy, by way of lightening the yacht—a horrid business handling the pigs of lead, heavy, greasy, and black. The saloon is an inferno, the deck like a collier's, and ourselves like sweeps.

"The anchors are laid out, and there is nothing more to be done.

"Oct. 18*th*.—Half a gale from the sou'-west when we turned out, but it helped us to float off safely at six. The dinghy was very nearly swamped with the weight of lead in it, and getting the ballast back into the yacht was the toughest job of all. We got the dinghy alongside, and Davies jumped in (nearly sinking it for good), balanced himself, fended off, and, whenever he got a chance, attached the pigs one by one on to a bight of rope, secured to the peak halyards, on which I hoisted from the deck. It was touch and go for a few minutes, and then easier.

"It was nine before we had finished replacing the pigs in the hold, a filthy but delicate operation, as they fit like a puzzle, and if one is out of place the floor-boards won't shut down. Coming on deck after it, we saw to our surprise the Blitz, lying at anchor in the Schill Balje, inside Spiekeroog, about a mile and a half off. She must have entered the Otzumer Ee at high-water for shelter from the gale; a neat bit of work for a vessel of her size, as Davies says she draws nine-foot-ten, and there can't be more than twelve on the bar at high-water neaps. Several smacks had run in too, and there were two galliots further up our channel, but we couldn't make out if the Kormoran was one.

"When the banks uncovered we lay more quietly, so landed and took a long, tempestuous walk over the Rute, with compass and notebooks. Returning at two, we found the glass tumbling down almost visibly.

"I suggested running for Bensersiel, one of the mainland villages south-west of us, on the evening flood, as it seemed just the right opportunity, if we were to visit one of those 'siels' at all. Davies was very lukewarm but events overcame him. At 3.30 a black, ragged cloud, appearing to trail into the very sea, brought up a terrific squall. This passed, and there was a deathly pause of ten minutes while the whole sky eddied and with smoke-wreaths. Then an icy puff struck us from the north-west, rapidly veering till it reached north east; there it settled and grew harder every moment.

"'Sou'-west to north-east—only the worst sort of that,' said Davies.

"The shift to the east changed the whole situation (as shifts often have before), making the Rute Flats a lee shore, while to windward lay the deep lagoons of the Otzumer Ee, bounded indeed by Spiekeroog, but still offering a big drift for wind and sea. We had to clear out sharp, to set the mizzen. It was out of the question to beat to windward, for it was blowing a hurricane in a few minutes. We must go to leeward, and Davies was for running further in well behind the Jans sand, and not risking Bensersiel. A blunder of mine, when I went to the winch to get up anchor, settled the question. Thirty out of our forty fathoms of chain were out. Confused by the motion and a blinding sleet-shower that had come on, and forgetting the tremendous strain on the cable, I cast the slack off the bitts and left it loose. There was then only one turn of the chain round the drum, enough in ordinary weather to prevent it running out. But now my first heave on the winch-lever started it slipping, and in an instant it was whizzing out of the hawse-pipe and overboard. I tried to stop it with my foot, stumbled at a heavy plunge of the yacht, heard something snap below, and saw the last of it disappear. The yacht fell off the wind, and drifted astern.

shouted, and had the sense to hoist the reefed foresail at once. Davies had her in hand in no time, and was steering south-west. Going aft I found him cool and characteristic.

"'Doesn't matter,' he said; 'anchor's buoyed.* We'll come back to-morrow and get it. Can't now. Should have had to slip it anyhow; wind and sea too strong. We'll try for Bensersiel. Can't trust to a warp and kedge out here.'

"An exciting run it was, across country, so to speak, over an unboomed watershed; but we had bearings from our morning's walk. Shoal water all the way and a hollow sea breaking everywhere. We soon made out the Bensersiel booms, but even under mizzen and foresail only we travelled too fast, and had to heave to outside them, for the channel looked too shallow still. We lowered half the centre-board and kept her just holding her own to windward, through a most trying period. In the end had to run for it sooner than we meant, as we were sagging to leeward in spite of all, and the light was failing. Bore up at 5.15, and raced up the channel with the booms on our left scarcely visible in the surf and rising water. Davies stood forward, signalling—port, starboard, or steady—with his arms, while I wrestled with the helm, flung from side to side and flogged by wave-tops. Suddenly found a sort of dyke on our right just covering with sea. The shore appeared through scud, and men on a quay shouting. Davies brandished his left arm furiously; I ported hard, and we were in smoother water. A few seconds more and we were whizzing through a slit between two woo jetties. Inside a small square harbour showed, but ther was no room to round up properly and no time to lowe sails. Davies just threw the kedge over, and it just go a grip in time to check our momentum and save ou bowsprit from the quayside. A man threw us a rop and we brought up alongside, rather bewildered.

* Ever since leaving the Elbe we had had a buoy-line on our anchor against the emergency of having to slip our cable and run. For the same reason the end of the chain was not made permanently fast below.

" Not more so than the natives, who seemed to thin we had dropped from the sky. They were very friendly with an undercurrent of disappointment, having ex pected salvage work outside, I think. All showed em barrassing helpfulness in stowing sails, etc. We wer rescued by a fussy person in uniform and spectacles who swept them aside and announced himself as th custom-house officer (fancy such a thing in this absur mud-hole !), marched down into the cabin, which was i a fearful mess and wringing wet, and producing ink, pen and a huge printed form, wanted to know our cargo, ou crew, our last port, our destination, our food, stores and everything. No cargo (pleasure); captain, Davies crew, me ; last port, Brunsbüttel ; destination, Eng land. What spirits had we ? Whisky, produced. Wha salt ? Tin of Cerebos, produced, and a damp deposi in a saucer. What coffee ? etc. Lockers searched, gun fingered, bunks rifled. Meanwhile the German chart and the log, the damning clues to our purpose, were i full evidence, crying for notice which they did not ge (We had forgotten our precautions in the hurry of ou start from the Rute.) When the huge form was as fu as he could make it, he suddenly became human, talka tive, and thirsty ; and, when we treated him, patronisin It seemed to dawn on him that, under our rough cloth and crust of brine and grime, we were two mad an wealthy aristocrats, worthy protégés of a high official. He insisted on our bringing our cushions to dry at his house, and to get rid of him we consented, for we were wet, hungry, and longing to change and wash. He talked himself away at last, and we hid the log and charts; but he returned, in the postmaster's uniform this time, before we had finished supper, and haled us and our cushions up through dark and mud to his cottage near the quay. To reach it we crossed a small bridge spanning what seemed to be a small river with sluice-gates, just as we had thought.

"He showed his prizes to his wife, who was quite flustered by the distinguished strangers, and received the cushions with awe; and next we were carried off to the Gasthaus and exhibited to the village circle, where we talked ducks and weather. (Nobody takes us seriously; I never felt less like a conspirator.) Our friend, who is a feather-headed chatterbox, is enormously important about his ridiculous little port, whose principal customer seems to be the Langeoog post-boat, a galliot running to and fro according to tide. A few lighters also come down the stream with bricks and produce from the interior, and are towed to the islands. The harbour has from five to seven feet in it for two hours out of twelve! Herr Schenkel talked us back to the yacht, which we found resting on the mud—and here we are. Davies pretends there are harbour smells, and says he won't be able to sleep; is already worrying about how to get away from here. Ashore, they were saying that it's impossible, under sail, in strong north-east winds, the channel being too narrow to tack in. For my part I find it a huge relief to be in any sort of harbour after a fortnight in the open. There are no tides or anchors to think about, and no bumping or rolling. Fresh milk to-morrow ! "

CHAPTER XVI

COMMANDER VON BRÜNING

To resume my story in narrative form.

I was awakened at ten o'clock on the 19th, after a long and delicious sleep, by Davies's voice outside, talking his unmistakable German. Looking out, in my pyjamas, I saw him on the quay above in conversation with a man in a long mackintosh coat and a gold-laced navy cap. He had a close-trimmed auburn beard, a keen, handsome face, and an animated manner. It was raining in a raw air.

They saw me, and Davies said : " Hullo, Carruthers ! Here's Commander von Brüning from the Blitz—that's ' meiner Freund ' Carruthers. (Davies was deplorably weak in terminations.)

The commander smiled broadly at me, and I inclined an uncombed head, while, for a moment, the quest was a dream, and I myself felt unutterably squalid and foolish. I ducked down, heard them parting, and Davies came aboard.

" We're to meet him at the inn for a talk at twelve," he said.

His news was that the Blitz's steam-cutter had come in on the morning tide, and he had met von Brüning when marketing at the inn. Secondly, the Kormoran had also come in, and was moored close by. It was as clear as possible, therefore, that the latter had watched us, and was in touch with the Blitz, and that both had seized the opportunity of our being cooped up in Bensersiel to take further stock of us. What had passed hitherto? Nothing much. Von Brüning had greeted Davies with cordial surprise, and said he had wondered yesterday if it was the Dulcibella that he had seen anchored behind Langeoog. Davies had explained that we had left the Baltic and were on our way home; taking the shelter of the islands.

"Supposing he comes on board and asks to see our log?" I said.

"Pull it out," said Davies, "It's rot, this hiding, after all. I say, I rather funk this interview; what are we to say? It's not in my line."

We resolved abruptly on an important change of plan, replaced the log and charts in the rack as the first logical step. They contained nothing but bearings, courses, and the bare data of navigation. To Davies they were hard-won secrets of vital import, to be lied for, however hard and distasteful lying was. I was cooler as to their value, but in any case the same thing was now in both our minds. There would be great difficulties in the coming interview if we tried to be too clever and conceal the fact that we had been exploring. We did not know how much von Brüning knew. When had our surveillance by the Kormoran begun? Apparently at Wangeroog, but possibly in the estuaries, where we had not fired a shot at duck. Perhaps he knew even more—Dollmann's treachery, Davies's escape, and our subsequent movements—we could not tell. On the other hand, exploration was known to be a fad of Davies's, and in September he had made no secret of it. It was safer to be consistent now. After breakfast we determined to find out something about the Kormoran, which lay on the mud at the other side of the harbour, and accordingly addressed ourselves to two mighty sailors, whose jerseys bore the legend "Post," and who towered conspicuous among a row of stolid Frisians on the quay, all gazing gravely down at us as at a curious bit of marine bric-à-brac. The twins (for such they proved to be) were most benignant giants, and asked us aboard the post-boat galliot for a chat. It was easy to bring the talk naturally round to the point we wished, and we soon gained some most interesting information, delivered in the broadest Frisian, but intelligible enough. They called the Kormoran a Memmert boat, or "wreck-works" boat. It seemed that off the western end of Juist, the island lying west of Norderney, there lay the bones of a French war-vessel, wrecked ages ago. She carried bullion which has never been recovered, in spite of many efforts. A salvage company was trying for it now, and had works on Memmert, an adjacent sand-bank. "That is Herr Grimm, the overseer himself," they said, pointing to the bridge above the sluice-gates. (I call him "Grimm" because it describes him exactly.) A man in a pilot jacket and peaked cap was leaning over the parapet.

"What's he doing here?" I asked.

They answered that he was often up and down the coast, work on the wreck being impossible in rough weather. They supposed he was bringing cargo in his galliot from Wilhelmshaven, all the company's plant and stores coming from that port. He was a local man from Aurich; an ex-tug skipper.

We discussed this information while walking out over the sands to see the channel at low water.

"Did you hear anything about this in September?" I asked.

"Not a word. I didn't go to Juist. I would have, probably, if I hadn't met Dollmann."

What in the world did it mean? How did it affect our plans?

"Look at his boots if we pass him," was all Davies had to suggest.

The channel was now a ditch, with a trickle in it, running north by east, roughly, and edged by a dyke of withies for the first quarter of a mile. It was still blowing fresh from the north-east, and we saw that exit was impossible in such a wind.

So back to the village, a paltry, bleak little place. We passed friend Grimm on the bridge; a dark, clean-shaved, saturnine man, wearing shoes. Approaching the inn:—

"We haven't settled quite enough, have we?" said Davies. "What about our future plans?"

"Heaven knows, we haven't," I said. "But I don't see how we can. We must see how things go. It's past twelve, and it won't do to be late."

"Well, I leave it to you."

"All right, I'll do my best. All you've got to do is to be yourself and tell one lie, if need be, about the trick Dollmann played you."

The next scene: von Brüning, Davies, and I, sitting over coffee and Kümmel at a table in a dingy inn-parlour overlooking the harbour and the sea, Davies with a full box of matches on the table before him. The Commander gave us a hearty welcome, and I am bound to say I liked him at once, as Davies had done; but I feared him, too, for he had honest eyes, but abominably clever ones.

I had impressed on Davies to talk and question as freely and naturally as though nothing uncommon had happened since he last saw von Brüning on the deck of the Medusa. He must ask about Dollmann—the mutual friend—at the outset, and, if questioned about that voyage in his company to the Elbe, must lie like a trooper as to the danger he had been in. This was the one clear and essential necessity, where much was difficult. Davies did his duty with precipitation, and blushed when he put his question, in a way that horrified me, till I remembered that his embarrassment was due, and would be ascribed to, another cause.

"Herr Dollmann is away still, I think," said von Brüning. (So Davies had been right at Brunsbüttel.) "Were you thinking of looking him up again?" he added.

"Yes," said Davies, shortly.

"Well, I'm sure he's away. But his yacht is back, I believe—and Fräulein Dollmann, I suppose."

"H'm!" said Davies; "she's a very fine boat that."

Our host smiled, gazing thoughtfully at Davies, who was miserable. I saw a chance, and took it mercilessly.

"We can call on Fräulein Dollman, at least, Davies," I said, with a meaning smile at von Brüning.

"H'm!" said Davies; "will he be back soon, do you think?"

The commander had begun to light a cigar, and took his time in answering. "Probably," he said, after some puffing, "he's never away very long. But you've seen them later than I have. Didn't you sail to the Elbe together the day after I saw you last?"

"Oh, part of the way," said Davies, with great negligence. "I haven't seen him since. He got there first; outsailed me."

"Gave you the slip, in fact?"

"Of course he beat me; I was close-reefed. Besides——"

"Oh, I remember; there was a heavy blow—a devil of a heavy blow. I thought of you that day. How did you manage?"

"Oh, it was a fair wind; it wasn't far, you see."

"Grosse Gott! In that." He nodded towards the window whence the Dulcibella's taper mast could be seen pointing demurely heavenwards.

"She's a splendid sea-boat," said Davies, indignantly.

"A thousand pardons!" said von Brüning, laughing.

"Don't shake my faith in her," I put in. "I've got to get to England in her."

"Heaven forbid; I was only thinking that there must have been some sea round the Scharhorn that day; a rare affair, no doubt, Herr Davies?"

"Scharhorn?" said Davies, who did not catch the idiom in the latter sentence. "Oh, we didn't go that way. We cut through the sands—by the Telte."

"The Telte! In a north-west gale!" The commander started, ceased to smile, and only stared. (It was genuine surprise; I could swear it. He had heard nothing of this before.)

"Herr Dollmann knew the way," said Davies, doggedly. "He kindly offered to pilot me through, and I wouldn't have gone otherwise." There was an awkward little pause.

"He led you well, it seems?" said von Brüning.

"Yes; there's a nasty surf there, though, isn't there? But it saves six miles—and the Scharhorn. Not that I saved distance. I was fool enough to run aground."

"Ah!" said the other, with interest.

"It didn't matter, because I was well inside then Those sands are difficult at high water. We've com back that way, you know."

("And we run aground every day," I remarked, with resignation.)

"Is that where the Medusa gave you the slip?" asked von Brüning, still studying Davies with a strange look which I strove anxiously to analyse.

"She wouldn't have noticed," said Davies. "It was very thick and squally—and she had got some way ahead. There was no need for her to stop, anyway. got off all right; the tide was rising still. But, of course I anchored there for the night."

"Where?"

"Inside there, under the Hohenhörn," said Davies simply.

"Under the what?"

"The Hohenhörn."

"Go on—didn't they wait for you at Cuxhaven?"

"I don't know; I didn't go that way." The commander looked more and more puzzled.

"Not by the ship canal I mean. I changed my mind about it, because the next day the wind was easterly It would have been a dead beat across the sands to Cuxhaven, while it was a fair wind straight out to the Eider River. So I sailed there, and reached the Baltic that way. It was all the same."

There was another pause.

"Well done, Davies," I thought. He had told his story well, using no subtlety. I knew it was exactly how he would have told it to anyone else, if he had not had irrefutable proof of foul play.

The commander laughed, suddenly and heartily

Another liqueur?" he said. Then, to me: "Upon my word, your friend amuses me. It's impossible to make him spin a yarn. I expect he had a bad time of it."

"That's nothing to him," I said; "he prefers it. He anchored me the other day behind the Hohenhörn in a gale of wind; said it was safer than a harbour, and more sanitary."

"I wonder he brought you here last night. It was a fair wind for England; and not very far."

"There was no pilot to follow, you see."

"With a charming daughter—no."

Davies frowned and glared at me. I was merciful and changed the subject.

"Besides," I said, "we've left our anchor and chain out there." And I made confession of my sin.

"Well, as it's buoyed, I should advise you to pick it up as soon as you can," said von Brüning, carelessly; "or someone else will."

"Yes, by Jove! Carruthers," said Davies, eagerly, "we must get out on this next tide."

"Oh, there's no hurry," I said, partly from policy, partly because the ease of the shore was on me. To sit on a chair upright is something of a luxury, however good the cause in which you have crouched like a monkey over a table at the level of your knees, with a reeking oil-stove at your ear.

"They're honest enough about here, aren't they?" I added. While the words were on my lips I remembered the midnight visitor at Wangeroog, and guessed that von Brüning was leading up to a test. Grimm (if he was the visitor) would have told him of his narrow escape from detection, and reticence on our part would show we suspected something. I could have kicked myself, but it was not too late. I took the bull by the horns, and, before the commander could answer, added :—

"By Jove! Davies, I forgot about that fellow at Wangeroog. The anchor might be stolen, as he says."

Davies looked blank, but von Brüning had turned to me.

"We never dreamed there would be thieves among these islands," I said, "but the other night I nearly caught a fellow in the act. He thought the yacht was empty."

I described the affair in detail, and with what humour I could. Our host was amused, and apologetic for the islanders.

"They're excellent folk," he said, "but they're born with predatory instincts. Their fathers made their living out of wrecks on this coast, and the children inherit a weakness for plunder. When Wangeroog lighthouse was built they petitioned the Government for compensation, in perfect good faith. The coast is well lighted now, and windfalls are rare, but the sight of a stranded yacht, with the owners ashore, would inflame the old passion ; and, depend upon it, someone has seen that anchor-buoy."

The word "wrecks" had set me tingling. Was it another test? Impossible to say ; but audacity was safer than reserve, and might save trouble in the future.

"Isn't there the wreck of a treasure-ship somewhere further west?" I asked. "We heard of it at Wangeroog" (my first inaccuracy). "They said a company was exploiting it."

"Quite right," said the commander, without a sign of embarrassment. "I don't wonder you heard of it. It's one of the few things folk have to talk about in these parts. It lies on Juister Riff, a shoal off Juist.* She was a French frigate, the Corinne, bound from Hamburg to Havre in 1811, when Napoleon held Hamburg as tight as Paris. She carried a million and a half in gold bars, and was insured in Hamburg; foundered in four fathoms, broke up, and there lies the treasure."

"Never been raised?"

"No. The underwriters failed and went bankrupt, and the wreck came into the hands of your English Lloyds'. It remained their property till '75, but they never got at the bullion. In fact, for fifty years it was never scratched at, and its very position grew doubtful, for the sand swallowed every stick. The rights passed through various hands, and in '86 were held by an enterprising Swedish company, which brought modern appliances, dived, dredged, and dug, fished up a lot of timber and bric-à-bric, and then broke. Since then, two Hamburg firms have tackled the job and lost their capital. Scores of lives have been spent over it, all told, and probably a million of money. Still there are the bars, somewhere."

"And what's being done now?"

"Well, recently a small local company was formed. It has a depôt at Memmert, and is working with a good deal of perseverance. An engineer from Bremen was the principal mover, and a few men from Norderney and Emden subscribed the capital. By the way, our friend Dollmann is largely interested in it."

Out of the corner of my eye I saw Davies's tell-tale face growing troubled with inward questionings.

"We mustn't get back to him," I said, laughing.

* See Map B.

"It's not fair to my friend. But all this is very interesting. Will they ever get those bars?"

"Ah! that's the point," said von Brüning, with a mysterious twinkle. "It's an undertaking of immense difficulty; for the wreck is wholly disintegrated, and the gold, being the heaviest part of it, has, of course, sunk the deepest. Dredging is useless after a certain point and the divers have to make excavations in the sand and shore them up as best they can. Every gale nullifies half their labour, and weather like this of the last fortnight plays the mischief with the work. Only this morning I met the overseer, who happens to be ashore here. He was as black as thunder over prospects."

"Well, it's a romantic speculation," I said. "They deserve a return for their money."

"I hope they'll get it," said the commander. "The fact is, I hold a few shares myself."

"Oh, I hope I haven't been asking indiscreet questions?"

"Oh, dear no; all the world knows what I've told you. But you'll understand that one has to be reticent as to results in such a case. It's a big stake, and the title is none too sound. There has been litigation over it. Not that I worry much about my investment; for I shan't lose much by it at the worst. But it gives one an interest in this abominable coast. I go and see how they're getting on sometimes, when I'm down that way."

"It is an abominable coast," I agreed, heartily "though you won't get Davies to agree."

"It's a magnificent place for sailing," said Davies looking wistfully out over the storm-speckled grey of the North Sea. He underwent some more chaff, and the talk passed to our cruising adventures in the Baltic and ae estuaries. Von Brüning cross-examined us with the ost charming urbanity and skill. Nothing he asked uld cause us the slightest offence; and a responsive ankness was our only possible course. So, date after ate, and incident after incident were elicited in the ost natural way. As we talked I was astonished to nd how little there was that was worth concealing, nd heartily thankful that we had decided on candour. y fluency gave me the lead, and Davies followed me; ut his own personality was really our tower of strength. realised that as I watched the play of his eager features, nd heard him struggle for expression on his favourite obby; all his pet phrases translated crudely into the ost excruciating German. He was convincing, because e was himself.

"Are there many like you in England?" asked von rüning once.

"Like me? Of course—lots," said Davies.

"I wish there were more in Germany; they play at achting over here—on shore half the time, drinking nd loafing; paid crews, clean hands, white trousers; id up in the middle of September."

"We haven't seen many yachts about," said Davies, olitely.

For my part, I made no pretence of being a Davies. aithful to my lower nature, I vowed the Germans were ght, and, not without a secret zest, drew a lurid picture the horrors of crewless cruising, and the drudgery at my remorseless skipper inflicted on me. It was elightful to see Davies wincing when I described my rst night at Flensburg, for I had my revenge at last, nd did not spare him. He bore up gallantly under y jesting, but I knew very well by his manner that he had not forgiven me my banter about the "charming daughter."

"You speak German well," said von Brüning.

"I have lived in Germany," said I.

"Studying for a profession, I suppose?"

"Yes," said I, thinking ahead. "Civil Service," was my prepared answer to the next question, but again (morbidly, perhaps) I saw a pitfall. That letter from my chief awaiting me at Norderney? My name was known, and we were watched. It might be opened. Lord, how casual we have been!

"May I ask what?"

"The Foreign Office." It sounded suspicious, but there it was.

"Indeed—in the Government service? When do you have to be back?"

That was how the question of our future intentions was raised, prematurely by me; for two conflicting theories were clashing in my brain. But the contents of the letter dogged me now, and "when at a loss, tell the truth," was an axiom I was finding sound. So I answered, "Pretty soon: in about a week. But I'm expecting a letter at Norderney, which may give me an extension. Davies said it was a good address to give," I added, smiling.

"Naturally," said von Brüning, dryly; the joke had apparently ceased to amuse him. "But you haven't much time then, have you?" he added, "unless you leave your skipper in the lurch. It's a long way to England, and the season is late for yachts."

I felt myself being hurried.

"Oh, you don't understand," I explained; "he's in no hurry. He's a man of leisure; aren't you, Davies?"

"What?" said Davies.

I translated my cruel question.

"Yes," said Davies, with simple pathos.

"If I have to leave him I shan't be missed—as an able seaman, at least. He'll just potter on down the Islands, running aground and kedging off, and arrive about Christmas."

"Or take the first fair gale to Dover," laughed the commander.

"Or that. So, you see, we're in no hurry; and we never make plans. And as for a passage to England straight, I'm not such a coward as I was at first, but I draw the line at that."

"You're a curious pair of shipmates; what's your point of view, Herr Davies?"

"I like this coast," said Davies. "And—we want to shoot some ducks." He was nervous, and forgot himself. I had already satirised our sporting armament and exploits, and hoped the subject was disposed of. Ducks were pretexts, and might lead to complications. I particularly wanted a free hand.

"As to wild fowl," said our friend, "I would like to give you gentlemen some advice. There are plenty to be got, now that autumn weather has set in (you wouldn't have got a shot in September, Herr Davies; I remember your asking about them when I saw you last). And even now it's early for amateurs. In hard winter weather a child can pick them up; but they're wild still, and want crafty hunting. You want a local punt, and above all a local man (you could stow him in your fo'c'sle), and to go to work seriously. Now, if you really wish for sport, I could help you. I could get you a trustworthy——"

"Oh, it's too good of you," stammered Davies, in a more unhappy accent than usual. "We can easily find one for ourselves. A man at Wangeroog offered——"

"Oh, did he?" interrupted von Brüning, laughing. "I'm not surprised. You don't know the Frieslanders. They're guileless, as I said, but they cling to their little perquisites." (I translated to Davies.) "They've been cheated out of wrecks, and they're all the more sensitive about ducks, which are more lucrative than fish. A stranger is a poacher. Your man would have made slight errors as to time and place."

"You said they were odd in their manner, didn't you, Davies?" I put in. "Look here, this is very kind of Commander von Brüning; but hadn't we better be certain of my plans before settling down to shoot? Let's push on direct to Norderney and get that letter of mine, and then decide. But we shan't see you again, I suppose, commander?"

"Why not? I am cruising westwards, and shall probably call at Norderney. Come aboard if you're there, won't you? I should like to show you the Blitz."

"Thanks, very much," said Davies, uneasily.

"Thanks, very much," said I, as heartily as I could.

Our party broke up soon after this.

"Well, gentlemen, I must take leave of you," said our friend. "I have to drive to Esens. I shall be going back to the Blitz on the evening tide, but you'll be busy then with your own boat."

It had been a puzzling interview, but the greatest puzzle was still to come. As we went towards the door, von Brüning made a sign to me. We let Davies pass out and remained standing.

"One word in confidence with you, Herr Carruthers," ne said, speaking low. "You won't think me officious, I hope. I only speak out of keen regard for your friend. It is about the Dollmanns—you see how the land lies? I wouldn't encourage him."

"Thanks," I said, "but really——"

"It's only a hint. He's a splendid young fellow, but if anything—you understand—too honest and simple. I take it you have influence with him, and I should use it."

"I was not in earnest," I said. "I have never seen the Dollmanns; I thought they were friends of yours," I added, looking him straight in the eyes.

"I know them, but"—he shrugged his shoulders—"I know everybody."

"What's wrong with them?" I said, point-blank.

"Softly! Herr Carruthers. Remember, I speak out of pure friendliness to you as strangers, foreigners, and young. You I take to have discretion, or I should not have said a word. Still, I will add this. We know very little of Herr Dollmann, of his origin, his antecedents. He is half a Swede, I believe, certainly not a Prussian; came to Norderney three years ago, appears to be rich, and has joined in various commercial undertakings. Little scope about here? Oh, there is more enterprise than you think—development of bathing resorts, you know, speculation in land on these islands. Sharp practice? Oh, no! he's perfectly straight in that way. But he's a queer fellow, of eccentric habits, and—and, well, as I say, little is known of him. That's all, just a warning. Come along."

I saw that to press him further was useless.

"Thanks; I'll remember," I said.

"And look here," he added, as we walked down the passage, "if you take my advice, you'll omit that visit to the Medusa altogether." He gave me a steady look, smiling gravely.

"How much do you know, and what do you mean?" were the questions that throbbed in my thoughts; but I could not utter them, so I said nothing and felt very young.

Outside we joined Davies, who was knitting his brow over prospects.

"It just comes of going into places like this," he said to me. "We may be stuck here for days. Too much wind to tow out with the dinghy, and too narrow a channel to beat in."

Von Brüning was ready with a new proposal.

"Why didn't I think of it before?" he said. "I'll tow you out in my launch. Be ready at 6.30; we shall have water enough then. My men will send you a warp."

It was impossible to refuse, but a sense of being personally conducted again oppressed me; and the last hope of a bed in the inn vanished. Davies was none too effusive either. A tug meant a pilot, and he had had enough of them.

"He objects to towage on principle," I said.

"Just like him!" laughed the other. "That's settled, then!"

A dogcart was standing before the inn door in readiness for von Brüning. I was curious about Esens and his business there. Esens, he said, was the principal town of the district, four miles inland.

"I have to go there," he volunteered, "about a poaching case—a Dutchman trawling inside our limits. That's my work, you know—police duty."

Had the words a deeper meaning?

"Do you ever catch an Englishman?" I asked, recklessly.

"Oh, very rarely; your countrymen don't come so far as this—except on pleasure." He bowed to us each and smiled.

"Not much of that to be got in Bensersiel," I laughed.

"I'm afraid you'll have a dull afternoon. Look here. I know you can't leave your boat altogether, and it's no use asking Herr Davies; but will you drive into Esens with me and see a Frisian town—for what it's worth? You're getting a dismal impression of Friesland." I excused myself, said I would stop with Davies; we would walk out over the sands and prospect for the evening's sail.

"Well, good-bye then," he said, "till the evening. Be ready for the warp at 6.30."

He jumped up, and the cart rattled off through the mud, crossed the bridge, and disappeared into the dreary hinterland.

CHAPTER XVII

CLEARING THE AIR

"HAS he gone to get the police, do you think?" said Davies, grimly.

"I don't think so," said I. "Let's go aboard before that customs fellow button-holes us."

A diminished row of stolid Frisians still ruminated over the Dulcibella. Friend Grimm was visible smoking on his forecastle. We went on board in silence.

"First of all, where exactly is Memmert?" I said.

Davies pulled down the chart, said "There," and flung himself at full length on a sofa.

The reader can see Memmert for himself. South of Juist,* abutting on the Ems delta, lies an extensive sandbank called Nordland, whose extreme western rim remains uncovered at the highest tides; the effect being to leave a C-shaped island, a mere paring of sand like a boomerang, nearly two miles long, but only 150 yds. or so broad, of curiously symmetrical outline, except at one spot, where it bulges to the width of a quarter of a mile. On the English chart its nakedness was absolute, save for a beacon at the south; but the German chart marked a building at the point where the bulge occurs. This was evidently the depôt. "Fancy living there!" I thought, for the very name struck cold. No wonder Grimm was grim; and no wonder he was used to seek change of air. But the advantages of the site were obvious. It was remarkably isolated, even in a region where isolation is the rule; yet it was conveniently near the wreck, which, as we had heard, lay two miles out on the Juister Reef. Lastly, it was clearly accessible at any state of the tide, for the six-fathom channel of the Ems estuary runs hard up to it on the south, and thence sends off an eastward branch which closely borders the southern horn, thus offering an anchorage at once handy, deep, and sheltered from seaward gales.

Such was Memmert, as I saw it on the chart, taking in its features mechanically, for while Davies lay there heedless and taciturn, a pretence of interest was useless. I knew perfectly well what was between us, but I did not see why I should make the first move; for I had a grievance too, an old one. So I sat back on my sofa and jotted down in my notebook the heads of our conversation at the inn while it was fresh in my memory, and strove to draw conclusions. But the silence continuing and becoming absurd, I threw my pride to the winds, and my notebook on the table.

* See Map B.

"I say, Davies," I said, "I'm awfully sorry I chaffed you about Fräulein Dollmann." (No answer.) "Didn't you see I couldn't help it?"

"I wish to Heaven we had never come in here," he said, in a hard voice; "it comes of landing ever." (I couldn't help smiling at this, but he wasn't looking at me.) "Here we are, given away, moved on, taken in charge, arranged for like Cook's tourists. I couldn't follow your game—too infernally deep for me, but——" That stung me.

"Look here," I said, "I did my best. It was you that muddled it. Why did you harp on ducks?"

"We could have got out of that. Why did you harp on everything idiotic—your letter, the Foreign Office, the Kormoran, the wreck, the——?"

"You're utterly unreasonable. Didn't you see what traps there were? I was driven the way I went. We started unprepared, and we're jolly well out of it."

Davies drove on blindly. "It was bad enough telling all about the channels and exploring——"

"Why, you agreed to that yourself!"

"I gave in to you. We can't explore any more now."

"There's the wreck, though."

"Oh, hang the wreck! It's all a blind, or he wouldn't have made so much of it. There are all these channels to be——"

"Oh, hang the channels! I know we wanted a free hand, but we've got to go to Norderney some time, and if Dollmann's away——"

"Why did you harp on Miss Dollmann?" said Davies.

We had worked round, through idle recrimination, to the real point of departure. I knew Davies was not himself, and would not return to himself till the heart of the matter was reached.

"Look here," I said, "you brought me out here to help you, because, as you say, I was clever, talked German, and—liked yachting (I couldn't resist adding this). But directly you really want me you turn round and go for me."

"Oh, I didn't mean all that, really," said Davies; "I'm sorry—I was worried."

"I know; but it's your own fault. You haven't been fair with me. There's a complication in this business that you've never talked about. I've never pressed you because I thought you would confide in me. You——"

"I know I haven't," said Davies.

"Well, you see the result. Our hand was forced. To have said nothing about Dollmann was folly—to have said he tried to wreck you was equal folly. The story we agreed on was the best and safest, and you told it splendidly. But for two reasons I had to harp on the daughter—one because your manner when they were mentioned was so confused as to imperil our whole position. Two, because your story, though the safest was, at the best, suspicious. Even on your own showing Dollmann treated you badly—discourteously, say, though you pretended not to have seen it. You want a motive to neutralise that, and induce you to revisit him in a friendly way. I supplied it, or rather I only encouraged von Brüning to supply it."

"Why revisit him, after all?" said Davies.

"Oh, come——"

"But don't you see what a hideous fix you've put me in? How caddish I feel about it?"

I did see, and I felt a cad myself, as his full distress came home to me. But I felt, too, that, whosesoever the fault, we had drifted into a ridiculous situation, and were like characters in one of those tiresome plays where misunderstandings are manufactured and so carefully sustained that the audience are too bored to wait for the dénouement. You can do that on the stage; but we wanted our dénouement.

"I'm very sorry," I said, "but I wish you had told me all about it. Won't you now? Just the bare, matter-of-fact truth. I hate sentiment, and so do you."

"I find it very difficult to tell people things," said Davies, "things like this." I waited. "I did like her —very much." Our eyes met for a second, in which all was said that need be said, as between two of our phlegmatic race. "And she's—separate from him. That was the reason of all my indecisions," he hurried on. "I only told you half at Schlei. I know I ought to have been open, and asked your advice. But I let it slide. I've been hoping all along that we might find what we want and win the game without coming to close quarters again."

I no longer wondered at his devotion to the channel theory, since, built on conviction, it was thus doubly fortified.

"Yet you always knew what might happen," I said. "At Schlei you spoke of 'settling with' Dollmann."

"I know. When I thought of him I was mad. I made myself forget the other part."

"Which recurred at Brunsbüttel?" I thought of the news we had there.

"Yes."

"Davies, we must have no more secrets. I'm going to speak out. Are you sure you've not misunderstood her? You say—and I'm willing to assume it—that Dollmann's a traitor and a murderer."

"Oh, hang the murder part!" said Davies, impatiently. "What does that matter?"

"Well, traitor. Very good; but in that case I suspect his daughter. No! let me go on. She was useful, to say the least. She encouraged you—you've told me that—to make that passage with them."

"Stop, Carruthers," said Davies, firmly. "I know you mean kindly; but it's no use. I believe in her."

I thought for a moment.

"In that case," I said, "I've something to propose. When we get out of this place let's sail straight away to England." ("There, Commander von Brüning," I thought, "you never can say I neglected your advice.")

"No!" exclaimed Davies, starting up and facing me. "I'm hanged if we will. Think what's at stake. Think of that traitor—plotting with Germans. My God!"

"Very good," I said. "I'm with you for going on. But let's face facts. We must scotch Dollmann. We can't do so without hurting her."

"Can't we possibly?"

"Of course not; be sensible, man. Face that. Next point; it's absurd to hope that we need not revisit them—it's ten to one that we must, if we're to succeed. His attempt on you is the whole foundation of our suspicions. And we don't even know for certain who he is yet. We're committed, I know, to going straight to Norderney now; but even if we weren't, should we do any good by exploring and prying? It's very doubtful. We know we're watched, if not suspected, and that disposes of nine-tenths of our power. The channels? Yes, but is it likely they'll let us learn them by heart, if they're of such vital importance, even if we are thought to be bona fide yachtsmen? And, seriously, apart from their value in war, which I don't deny, are they at the root of this business? But we'll talk about that in a moment. The point now is, what shall we do if we meet the Dollmanns?"

Beads of sweat stood on Davies's brow. I felt like a torturer, but it could not be helped. "Tax him with having wrecked you? Our quest would be at an end! We must be friendly. You must tell the story you told to-day, and chance his believing it. If he does, so much the better; if he doesn't, he won't dare say so, and we still have chances. We gain time, and have a tremendous hold on him—if we're friendly." Davies winced. I gave another turn to the screw. "Friendly with them both, of course. You were before, you know; you liked her very much—you must seem to still."

"Oh, stop your infernal logic."

"Shall we chuck it and go to England?" I asked again, as an inquisitor might say, "Have you had enough?" No answer. I went on: "To make it easier, you do like her still." I had roused my victim at last.

"What the devil do you mean, Carruthers? That I'm to trade on my liking for her—on her innocence, to —good God! what do you mean?"

"No, no, not that. I'm not such a cad, or such a fool, or so ignorant of you. If she knows nothing of her father's character and likes you—and you like her—and you are what you are—oh, Heavens! man, face it, realise it! But what I mean is this: is she, can she be, what you think? Imagine his position if we're right about him; the vilest creature on God's earth—a disgraceful past to have been driven to this—in the pay of Germany. I want to spare you misery." I was going to add: "And if you're on your guard, to increase our chances." But the utter futility of such suggestions silenced me. What a plan I had foreshadowed! An enticing plan and a fair one, too, as against such adversaries; turning this baffling cross-current to advantage as many a time we had worked eddies of an adverse tide in these difficult seas. But Davies was Davies, and there was an end of it; his faith and simplicity shamed me. And the pity of it, the cruelty of it, was that his very qualities were his last torture, raising to the acutest pitch the conflict between love and patriotism. Remember that the latter was his dominant life-motive, and that here and now was his chance—if you would gauge the bitterness of that conflict.

It was in its last throes now. His elbows were on the table, and his twitching hands pressed on his forehead. He took them away.

"Of course we must go on. It can't be helped, that's all."

"And you believe in her?"

"I'll remember what you've said. There may be some way out. And—I'd rather not talk about that any more. What about the wreck?"

Further argument was futile. Davies by an effort seemed to sweep the subject from his thoughts, and did my best to do the same. At any rate the air was cleared—we were friends; and it only remained to grapple with the main problem in the light of the morning's interview.

Every word that I could recollect of that critical conversation I reviewed with Davies, who had imperfectly understood what he had not been directly concerned in; and, as I did so, I began to see with what cleverness each succeeding sentence of von Brüning's was designed to suit both of two contingencies. If we were innocent travellers, he was the genial host, communicative and helpful. If we were spies, his tactics had been equally applicable. He had outdone us in apparent candour, hiding nothing which he knew we would discover for ourselves, and contriving at the same time both to gain knowledge and control of our movements, and to convey us warnings, which would only be understood if we were guilty, that we were playing an idle and perilous game, and had better desist. But in one respect we had had the advantage, and that was in the version Davies had given of his stranding on the Hohenhörn. Inscrutable as our questioner was, he let it appear not only that the incident was new to him, but that he conjectured at its sinister significance. A little cross-examination on detail would have been fatal to Davies's version; but that was where our strength lay; he dared not cross-examine for fear of suggesting to Davies suspicions which he might never have felt. Indeed, I thought I detected that fear underlying his whole attitude towards us, and it strengthened a conviction which had been growing in me since Grimm's furtive midnight visit, that the secret of this coast was of so important and delicate a nature that rather than attract attention to it at all, overt action against intruders would only be taken in the last resort, and on irrefragable proofs of guilty intention.

Now for our clues. I had come away with two, each the germ of a distinct theory, and both obscured by the prevailing ambiguity. Now, however, as we thumbed the chart and I gave full rein to my fancy, one of them, the idea of Memmert, gained precision and vigour every moment. True, such information as we had about the French wreck and his own connection with it was placed most readily at our disposal by von Brüning; but I took it to be information calculated only to forestall suspicion, since he was aware that we already associated him with Dollmann, possibly also with Grimm, and it was only likely that in the ordinary course we should learn that the trio were jointly concerned in Memmert. So much for the facts; as for the construction he wished us to put on them, I felt sure it was absolutely false. He wished to give us the impression that the buried treasure itself was at the root of any mystery we might have scented. I do not know if the reader fully appreciated that astute suggestion—the hint that secrecy as to results was necessary owing both to the great sum at stake and the flaw in the title, which he had been careful to inform us had passed through British hands. What he meant to imply was, "Don't be surprised if you have midnight visitors; Englishmen prowling along this coast are suspected of being Lloyds' agents." An ingenious insinuation, which, at the time it was made, had caused me to contemplate a new and much more commonplace solution of our enigma than had ever occurred to us; but it was only a passing doubt, and I dismissed it altogether now.

The fact was, it either explained everything or nothing. As long as we held to our fundamental assumption—that Davies had been decoyed into a death-trap in September—it explained nothing. It was too fantastic to suppose that the exigencies of a commercial speculation would lead to such extremities as that. We were not in the South Sea Islands; nor were we the puppets of a romance. We were in Europe, dealing not only with a Dollmann, but with an officer of the German Imperial Navy, who would scarcely be connected with a commercial enterprise which could conceivably be reduced to forwarding its objects in such a fashion. It was shocking enough to find him in relations with such a scoundrel at all, but it was explicable if the motive were imperial—not so if it were financial. No; to accept the suggestion we must declare the whole quest a mare's nest from beginning to end; the attempt on Davies a delusion of his own fancy, the whole structure we had built on it, baseless.

"Well," I can hear the reader saying, "why not? You, at any rate, were always a little sceptical."

Granted; yet I can truthfully say I scarcely faltered for a moment. Much had happened since Schlei Fiord. I had seen the mechanism of the death-trap; I had lived with Davies for a stormy fortnight, every hour of which had increased my reliance on his seamanship, and also, therefore, on his account of an event which depended largely for its correct interpretation on a balanced nautical judgment. Finally, I had been unconsciously realising, and knew from his mouth to-day, that he had exercised and acted on that judgment in the teeth of personal considerations, which his loyal nature made overwhelming in their force.

What, then, was the meaning of Memmert? At the outset it riveted my attention on the Ems estuary, whose mouth it adjoins. We had always rather neglected the Ems in our calculations; with some excuse, too, for at first sight its importance bears no proportion to that of the three greater estuaries. The latter bear vessels of the largest tonnage and deepest draught to the very quays of Hamburg, Bremerhaven, and the naval dock-yard of Wilhelmshaven; while two of them, the Elbe and the Weser, are commerce carriers on the vastest scale for the whole empire. The Ems, on the other hand, only serves towns of the second class. A glance at the chart explains this. You see a most imposing estuary on a grander scale than any of the other three taken singly, with a length of thirty miles and a frontage on the North Sea of ten miles, or one-seventieth, roughly, of the whole seaboard; encumbered by outlying shoals, and blocked in the centre by the island of Borkum, but presenting two fine deep-water channels to the incoming vessel. These roll superbly through enormous sheets of sand, unite and approach the mainland in one stately stream three miles in breadth. But then comes a sad falling off. The navigable fairway shoals and shrinks, middle grounds obstruct it, and shelving foreshores persistently deny it that easy access to the land that alone can create great seaboard cities. All the ports of the Ems are tidal; the harbour of Delfzyl, on the Dutch side, dries at low water, and Emden, the principal German port, can only be reached by a lock and a mile of canal.

But this depreciation is only relative. Judged on its merits, and not by the standard of the Elbe, it is a very important river. Emden is a flourishing and growing port. For shallow craft the stream is navigable far into the interior, where, aided by tributaries and allied canals (notably the connection with the Rhine at Dortmund, then approaching completion), it taps the resources of a great area. Strategically there was still less reason for underrating it. It is one of the great maritime gates of Germany; and it is the westernmost gate, the nearest to Great Britain and France, contiguous to Holland. Its great forked delta presents two yawning breaches in that singular rampart of islets and shoals which masks the German seaboard—a seaboard itself so short in proportion to the empire's bulk, that, as Davies used to say, "every inch of it must be important." Warships could force these breaches, and so threaten the mainland at one of its few vulnerable points. Quay accommodation is no object to such visitors; intricate navigation no deterrent. Even the heaviest battleships could approach within striking distance of the land, while cruisers and military transports could penetrate to the level of Emden itself. Emden, as Davies had often pointed out, is connected by canal with Wilhelmshaven on the Jade, a strategic canal, designed to carry gunboats as well as merchandise.

Now Memmert was part of the outer rampart; its tapering sickle of sand directly commanded the eastern breach; it must be connected with the defence of this breach. No more admirable base could be imagined; self-contained and isolated, yet sheltered, accessible—better than Juist and Borkum. And supposing it were desired to shroud the nature of the work in absolute secrecy, what a pretext lay to hand in the wreck and its buried bullion, which lay in the offing opposite the fairway!

On Memmert was the depôt for the salvage operation Salvage work, with its dredging and diving, offered pr cisely the disguise that was needed. It was submarin and so are some of the most important defences of port mines, and dirigible torpedoes. All the details of th story were suggestive: the "small local company" the "engineer from Bremen" (who, I wondered, wa he?); the few shares held by von Brüning, enough t explain his visits; the stores and gear coming fro Wilhelmshaven, a naval dockyard.

Try as I would I could not stir Davies's imagination a mine was stirred. He was bent on only seeing the ob jections, which, of course, were numerous enough. Coul secrecy be ensured under pretext of salving a wreck It must be a secret shared by many—divers, crews tugs, employés of all sorts. I answered that trad secrets are often preserved under no less difficult co ditions, and why not imperial secrets?

"Why the Ems and not the Elbe?" he asked.

"Perhaps," I replied, "the Elbe, too, held simila mysteries." Neuerk Island might, for all we knew, b another Memmert; when cruising in that region we ha had no eyes for such things, absorbed in a preconceive theory of our own. Besides, we must not take ou selves too seriously. We were amateurs, not experts coast defence, and on such vague grounds to fastidious reject a clue which went so far as this one was to quarr with our luck. There was a disheartening corollary this latter argument that in my new-born zeal I sh my eyes to. As amateurs, were we capable of usi our clue and gaining exact knowledge of the defences question? Davies, I knew, felt this strongly, and think it accounted for his lukewarm view of Memme ore than he was aware. He clung more obstinately an ever to his "channel theory," conscious that it ered the one sort of opportunity of which with his culiar gifts he was able to take advantage. He admitted, however, that it was under a cloud at present, r if knowledge of the coastwise navigation were a crime itself we should scarcely be sitting here now. "It's mething to do with it, anyhow!" he persisted.

CHAPTER XVIII

IMPERIAL ESCORT

EMMERT gripped me, then, to the exclusion of a rival otion which had given me no little perplexity during e conversation with von Brüning. His reiterated adce that we should lose no time in picking up our anchor d chain had ended by giving me the idea that he was xious to get us away from Bensersiel and the mainland. t first I had taken the advice partly as a test of our eracity (as I gave the reader to understand), and partly an indirect method of lulling any suspicions which rimm's midnight visit may have caused. Then it ruck me that this might be over-subtlety on my part, d the idea recurred when the question of our future ans cropped up, and hampered me in deciding on a urse. It returned again when von Brüning offered to w us out in the evening. It was in my mind when I estioned him as to his business ashore, for it occurred me that perhaps his landing here was not solely due a wish to inspect the crew of the Dulcibella. Then me his perfectly frank explanation (with its sinister uble entente for us), coupled with an invitation to me to accompany him to Esens. But, on the principle o "timeo Danaos" etc., I instantly smelt a ruse, not tha I dreamt that I was to be decoyed into captivity; bu if there was anything here which we two might discove in the few hours left to us, it was an ingenious plan t remove the most observant of the two till the hour o departure.

Davies scorned them, and I had felt only a fain curiosity in these insignificant hamlets, influenced, I an afraid, chiefly by a hankering after terra firma which th pitiless rigour of his training had been unable to cure.

But it was imprudent to neglect the slightest chance It was three o'clock, and I think both our brains were beginning to be addled with thinking in close confine ment. I suggested that we should finish our council o war in the open, and we both donned oilskins and turned out. The sky had hardened and banked into an even canopy of lead, and the wind drove before it a fine cold rain. You could hear the murmur of the rising flood on the sands outside, but the harbour was high above i still, and the Dulcibella and the other boats squatted lov in a bed of black slime. Native interest seemed to be a last assuaged, for not a soul was visible on the bank (I cannot call it a quay); but the top of a black sou' wester with a feather of smoke curling round it showed above the forehatch of the Kormoran.

"I wish I could get a look at your cargo, my friend," I thought to myself.

We gazed at Bensersiel in silence.

"There can't be anything here?" I said.

"What can there be?" said Davies.

"What about that dyke?" I said, with a sudden inspiration.

From the bank we could see all along the coast-line, hich is dyked continuously, as I have already said. he dyke was here a substantial brick-faced embank-ent, very similar, though on a smaller scale, to that hich had bordered the Elbe near Cuxhaven, and over hose summit we had seen the snouts of guns.

" I say, Davies," I said, " do you think this coast ould be invaded? Along here, I mean, behind these lands? "

Davies shook his head. " I've thought of that," he id. " There's nothing in it. It's just the very last lace on earth where a landing would be possible. No ansport could get nearer than where the Blitz is lying, ur miles out."

" Well, you say every inch of this coast is important? "

" Yes, but it's the water I mean."

" Well, I want to see that dyke. Let's walk along it."

My mushroom theory died directly I set foot on it. was the most innocent structure in the world—like a housand others in Essex and Holland—topped by a arrow path, where we walked in single file with arms kimbo to keep our balance in the gusts of wind. Below s lay the sands on one side and rank fens on the other, terspersed with squares of pasture ringed in with tches. After half a mile we dropped down and came ack by a short circuit inland, following a mazy path—hich was mostly right angles and minute plank bridges, ll we came to the Esens road. We crossed this and on after found our way barred by the stream I spoke . This involved a détour to the bridge in the village, nd a stealthy avoidance of the post-office, for dread of s garrulous occupant. Then we followed the dyke in e other direction, and ended by a circuit over the sands, which were fast being covered by the tide, and so back to the yacht.

Nobody appeared to have taken the slightest notice of our movements.

As we walked we had tackled the last question, "What are we to do?" and found very little to say on it. We were to leave to-night (unless the Esens police appeared on the scene), and were committed to sailing direct to Norderney, as the only alternative to duck shooting under the espionage of a "trustworthy" nominee of von Brüning's. Beyond that—vagueness and difficulty of every sort.

At Norderney I should be fettered by my letter. If it seemed to have been opened and it ordered my return I was limited to a week, or must risk suspicion by staying. Dollmann was away (according to von Brüning) "would probably be back soon"; but how soon? Beyond Norderney lay Memmert. How to probe its secret? The ardour it had roused in me was giving way to a mortifying sense of impotence. The sight of the Kormoran, with her crew preparing for sea, was a pointed comment on my diplomacy, and most of all on my ridiculous survey of the dykes. When all was said and done we were protégés of von Brüning, and dogged by Grimm. Was it likely they would let us succeed?

The tide was swirling into the harbour in whorls of chocolate froth, and as it rose all Bensersiel, dominated as before by Herr Schenkel, straggled down to the quay to watch the movements of shipping during the transient but momentous hour when the mud-hole was a seaport. The captain's steam-cutter was already afloat, and her sailors busy with sidelights and engines. When it became known that we, too, were to sail, and under such distinguished escort, the excitement intensified.

Again our friend of the customs was spreading out pers to sign, while a throng of helpful Frisians, headed the twin giants of the post-boat, thronged our decks d made us ready for sea in their own confused fashion. ain we were carried up to the inn and overwhelmed th advice, and warnings, and farewell toasts. Then ck again to find the Dulcibella afloat, and von Brüning st arrived, cursing the weather and the mud, chaffing avies, genial and débonnaire as ever.

"Stow that mainsail, you won't want it," he said. I'll tow you right out to Spiekeroog. It's your only chorage for the night in this wind—under the island, ar the Blitz, and that would mean a dead beat for you the dark."

The fact was so true, and the offer so timely, that avies's faint protests were swept aside in a torrent of licule.

"And now I think of it," the commander ended, "I'll ake the trip with you, if I may. It'll be pleasanter d drier."

We all three boarded the Dulcibella, and then the end me. Our tow-rope was attached, and at half-past six e little launch jumped into the collar, and amidst a monstration that could not have been more hearty if e had been ambassadors on a visit to a friendly power, e sidled out through the jetties.

It took us more than an hour to cover the five miles Spiekeroog, for the Dulcibella was a heavy load in e stiff head wind, and Davies, though he said nothing, owed undisguised distrust of our tug's capacities. He once left the helm to me and flung himself on the gear, t resting till every rope was ready to hand, the mainsail efed, the binnacle lighted, and all ready for setting sail or anchoring at a moment's notice. Our guest watched these precautions with infinite amusement. He was in the highest and most mischievous humour, raining banter on Davies and mock sympathy on me, laughing at our huge compass, heaving the lead himself, startling us with imaginary soundings, and doubting if his men were sober. I offered entertainment and warmth below, but he declined on the gound that Davies would be tempted to cut the tow-rope and make us pass the night on a safe sandbank. Davies took the raillery unmoved. His work done, he took the tiller and sat bareheaded, intent on the launch, the course, the details, and chances of the present. I brought up cigars, and we settled ourselves facing him, our backs to the wind and spray. And so we made the rest of the passage, von Brüning cuddled against me and the cabin-hatch, alternately shouting a jest to Davies and talking to me in a light and charming vein, with just that shade of patronage that the disparity in our ages warranted, about my time in Germany, places, people, and books I knew, and about life, especially young men's life, in England, a country he had never visited, but hoped to; I responding as well as I could, striving to meet his mood, acquit myself like a man, draw zest instead of humiliation from the irony of our position, but scarcely able to make headway against a numbing sense of defeat and incapacity. A queer thought was haunting me, too, that such skill and judgment as I possessed was slipping from me as we left the land and faced again the rigours of this exacting sea. Davies, I very well knew, was under exactly the opposite spell—a spell which even the reproach of the tow-rope could not annul. His face, in the glow of the binnacle, was beginning to wear that same look of contentment ıd resolve that I had seen on it that night we had iled to Kiel from Schlei Fiord. Heaven knows he had ore cause for worry than I—a casual comrade in an lventure which was peculiarly his, which meant every- ing on earth to him ; but there he was, washing away erplexity in the salt wind, drawing counsel and confi- ence from the unfailing source of all his inspirations— ıe sea.

" Looks happy, doesn't he ? " said the captain once. I unted that he did, ashamed to find how irritated the mark made me.

" You'll remember what I said," he added in my ear.

" Yes," I said. " But I should like to see her. What she like ? "

" Dangerous." I could well believe it.

The hull of the Blitz loomed up, and a minute later our edge was splashing overboard and the launch was back- g alongside.

" Good-night, gentlemen," said our passenger. " You're fe enough here, and you can run across in ten minutes the morning and pick up your anchor, if it's there ill. Then you've a fair wind west—to England if you ke. If you decide to stay a little longer in these parts, ıd I'm in reach, count on me to help you, to sport or ıything else."

We thanked him, shook hands, and he was gone.

" He's a thundering good chap, anyhow," said Davies ; ıd I heartily agreed.

The narrow vigilant life began again at once. We ere " safe enough " in a sense, but a warp and a twenty- ound anchor were poor security if the wind backed or creased. Plans for contingencies had to be made, ıd deck-watches kept till midnight, when the weather seemed to improve, and stars appeared. The glass wa rising, so we turned in and slept under the very win so to speak, of the Imperial Government.

"Davies," I said, when we were settled in our bunk
"it's only a day's sail to Norderney, isn't it?"

"With a fair wind, less, if we go outside the island direct."

"Well, it's settled that we do that to-morrow?"

"I suppose so. We've got to get the anchor firs Good-night."

CHAPTER XIX

THE RUBICON

It was a cold, vaporous dawn, the glass rising, and th wind fallen to a light air still from the north-east. Ou creased and sodden sails scarcely answered to it as w crept across the oily swell to Langeoog. "Fogs an calms," Davies prophesied. The Blitz was astir when w passed her, and soon after steamed out to sea. Onc over the bar, she turned westward and was lost to vie in the haze. I should be sorry to have to explain ho we found that tiny anchor-buoy, on the expressionle waste of grey. I only know that I hove the lead i cessantly while Davies conned, till at last he was gra bing overside with the boat-hook, and there was th buoy on deck. The cable was soon following it, an finally the rusty monster himself, more loathsome tha usual, after his long sojourn in the slime.

"That's all right," said Davies. "Now we can g anywhere."

"Well, it's Norderney, isn't it? We've settled that.

"Yes, I suppose we have. I was wondering wheth wouldn't be shortest to go inside the Langeoog after

."

" Surely not," I urged. " The tide's ebbing now, and e light's bad ; it's new ground, with a ' watershed ' to oss, and we're safe to get aground."

" All right—outside. Ready about." We swung zily round and headed for the open sea. I record the ct, but in truth Davies might have taken me where liked, for no land was visible, only a couple of ghostly ooms.

" It seems a pity to miss over that channel," said avies, with a sigh ; " just when the Kormoran can't atch us." (We had not seen her at all this morning.)

I set myself to the lead again, averse to reopening a rren argument. Grimm had done his work for the esent, I felt certain, and was on his way by the shortest ad to Norderney and Memmert.

We were soon outside and heading west, our boom uared away and the island sand-dunes just apparent nder our lee. Then the breeze died to the merest raught, and left us rolling inert in a long swell. Con-med with impatience to get on I saw fatality in this ilure of wind, after a fortnight of unprofitable meandergs, when we had generally had too much of it, and ways enough for our purpose. I tried to read below, t the vile squirting of the centre-board drove me up.

" Can't we go any faster ? " I burst out once. I felt at there ought to be a pyramid of gauzy canvas aloft, innakers, flying jibs, and what not.

" I don't go in for speed," said Davies, shortly. He yally did his best to " shove her " along, but puffs d calms were the rule all day, and it was only by wing in the dinghy for two hours in the afternoon that we covered the length of Langeoog, and crept before dark to an anchorage behind Baltrum, its slug-shaped neighbour on the west. Strictly, I believe, we should have kept the sea all night; but I had not the grit to suggest that course, and Davies was only too glad of an excuse for threading the shoals of the Accumer Ee on a rising tide. The atmosphere had been slowly clearing as the day wore on; but we had scarcely anchored ten minutes before a blanket of white fog, rolling in from seaward, swallowed us up. Davies was already afield in the dinghy, and I had to guide him back with a foghorn, whose music roused hosts of sea birds from the surrounding flats, and brought them wheeling and complaining round us, a weird invisible chorus to my mournful solo.

The fog hung heavy still at daybreak on the 20th, but dispersed partially under a catspaw from the south about eight o'clock, in time for us to traverse the boomed channel behind Baltrum, before the tide left the watershed.

"We shan't get far to-day," said Davies, with philosophy. "And this sort of thing may go on for any time. It's a regular autumn anti-cyclone—glass thirty point five and steady. That gale was the last of a stormy equinox."

We took the inside route as a matter of course to-day. It was now the shortest to Norderney harbour, and scarcely less intricate than the Wichter Ee, which appeared to be almost totally blocked by banks, and is in fact, the most impassable of all these outlets to the North Sea. But, as I say, this sort of navigation always puzzling to me, was utterly bewildering in hazy weather. Any attempt at orientation made me giddy. So I slaved at the lead, varying my labour with a fierce ut of kedge-work when we grounded somewhere. I d two rests before two o'clock, one of an hour, when e ran into a patch of windless fog; another of a few oments, when Davies said, "There's Norderney!" and saw, surmounting a long slope of weedy sand, still wet th the receding sea, a cluster of sandhills exactly like hundred others I had seen of late, but fraught with new and unique interest.

The usual formula, "What have you got now?" ecked my reverie, and "Helm's a-lee," ended it for e time. We tacked on (for the wind had headed us) very shoal water.

Suddenly Davies said: "Is that a boat ahead?"

"Do you mean that galliot?" I asked. I could ainly distinguish one of those familiar craft about half mile away, just within the limit of vision.

"The Kormoran, do you think?" I added. Davies id nothing, but grew inattentive to his work. "Barely ur," from me passed unnoticed, and we touched once, t swung off under some play of the current. Then me abruptly, "Stand by the anchor. Let go," and brought up in mid-stream of the narrow creek we ere following. I triced up the main-tack, and stowed e head-sails unaided. When I had done Davies was ill gazing to windward through his binoculars, and, my astonishment, I noticed that his hands were embling violently. I had never seen this happen before, en at moments when a false turn of the wrist meant ath on a surf-battered bank.

"What is it?" I asked; "are you cold?"

"That little boat," he said. I gazed to windward, o, and now saw a scrap of white in the distance, in arp relief.

"Small standing lug and jib; it's her, right enough," said Davies to himself, in a sort of nervous stammer.

"Who? What?"

"Medusa's dinghy."

He handed, or rather pushed, me the glasses, still gazing

"Dollmann?" I exclaimed.

"No, it's hers—the one she always sails. She's com to meet m—, us."

Through the glasses the white scrap became a graceful little sail, squared away for the light following breeze. An angle of the creek hid the hull, then it glided into view. Someone was sitting aft steering, man or woman I could not say, for the sail hid most of the figure. For full two minutes—two long, pregnant minutes—we watched it in silence. The damp air was fogging the lenses, but I kept them to my eyes; for I did not want to look at Davies. At last I heard him draw a deep breath, straighten himself up, and give one of his characteristic "h'ms." Then he turned briskly aft, cast off the dinghy's painter, and pulled her up alongside.

"You come too," he said, jumping in, and fixing the rowlocks. (His hands were steady again.) I laughed and shoved the dinghy off.

"I'd rather you did," he said, defiantly.

"I'd rather stay. I'll tidy up, and put the kettle on." Davies had taken a half stroke, but paused.

"She oughtn't to come aboard," he said.

"She might like to," I suggested. "Chilly day, long way from home, common courtesy——"

"Carruthers," said Davies, "if she comes aboard please remember that she's outside this business. There are no clues to be got from her."

A little lecture which would have nettled me mo

I had not been exultantly telling myself that, once
d for all, for good or ill, the Rubicon was passed.
' It's your affair this time," I said; " run it as you ase."

He sculled away with vigorous strokes. " Just as he
' I thought to myself: bare head, beaded with fog-w, ancient oilskin coat (only one button); grey jersey; ey woollen trousers (like a deep-sea fisherman's) stuffed o long boots. A vision of his antitype, the Cowes ilanderer, crossed me for a second. As to his face well, I could only judge by it, and marvel, that he s gripping his dilemma by either horn, as firmly as gripped his sculls.

I watched the two boats converging. They would et in the natural course about three hundred yards ay, but a hitch occurred. First, the sail-boat checked d slewed; " aground," I concluded. The row-boat pt forward still; then checked, too. From both a at splashing of sculls floated across the still air, then ence. The summit of the watershed, a physical Rubin, prosaic and slimy, had still to be crossed, it seemed.
t it could be evaded. Both boats headed for the rthern side of the creek: two figures were out on the nk, hauling on two painters. Then Davies was strid-over the sand, and a girl—I could see her now—was ning to meet him. And then I thought it was time go below and tidy up.

Nothing on earth could have made the Dulcibella's oon a worthy reception-room for a lady. I could only hurried efforts to make it look its best by plying unch of cotton-waste and a floor-brush; by pitching o racks and lockers the litter of pipes, charts, odd-nts of apparel, and so on, that had a way of collecting afresh, however recently we had tidied up; by neatl arranging our demoralised library, and by lighting th stove and veiling the table under a clean white cloth.

I suppose about twenty minutes had elapsed, and was scrubbing fruitlessly at the smoky patch on th ceiling, when I heard the sound of oars and voices ou side. I threw the cotton-waste into the fo'c'sle, mad an onslaught on my hands, and then mounted the com panion ladder. Our own dinghy was just rounding u alongside, Davies sculling in the bows, facing him in th stern a young girl in a grey Tam-o'-shanter, loose wate proof jacket and dark serge skirt, the latter, to be frigidl accurate, disclosing a pair of workman-like rubber boo which, mutatis mutandis, were very like those Davi was wearing. Her hair, like his, was spangled wit moisture, and her rose-brown skin struck a note delicious colour against the sullen Stygian background.

"There he is," said Davies. Never did his "meine Freund, Carruthers," sound so pleasantly in my ears never so discordantly the "Fräulein Dollmann" tha followed it. Every syllable of the four was a lie. Tw honest English eyes were looking up into mine; a honest English hand—is this insular nonsense? Perhap so, but I stick to it—a brown, firm hand—no, not so ver small, my sentimental reader—was clasping mine. C course I had strong reasons, apart from the racial instinc for thinking her to be English, but I believe that if had had none at all I should at any rate have congratu lated Germany on a clever bit of plagiarism. By h voice, when she spoke, I knew that she must have talke German habitually from childhood; diction and accen were faultless, at least to my English ear; but the nativ constitutional ring was wanting.

She came on board. There was a hollow discussion rst about time and weather, but it ended as we all in ur hearts wished it to end. None of us uttered our al scruples. Mine, indeed, were too new and rudi- entary to be worth uttering, so I said common-sense hings about tea and warmth; but I began to think bout my compact with Davies.

"Just for a few minutes, then," she said.

I held out my hand and swung her up. She gazed ound the deck and rigging with profound interest—a reathless, hungry interest—touching to see.

"You've seen her before, haven't you?" I said.

"I've not been on board before," she answered.

This struck me in passing as odd; but then I had nly too few details from Davies about his days at orderney in September.

"Of course, that is what puzzled me," she exclaimed, ddenly, pointing to the mizzen. "I knew there was omething different."

Davies had belayed the painter, and now had to xplain the origin of the mizzen. This was a cumbrous rocess, and his hearer's attention soon wandered from he subject and became centred in him—his was already ore than half in her—and the result was a golden pportunity for the discerning onlooker. It was very rief, but I made the most of it; buried deep a few egrets, did a little heartfelt penance, told myself I had een a cynical fool not to have foreseen this, and faced he new situation with a sinking heart; I am not ashamed o admit that, for I was fond of Davies, and I was keen bout the quest.

She had never been a guilty agent in that attempt on Davies. Had she been an unconscious tool or only an unwilling one? If the latter, did she know the secr we were seeking? In the last degree unlikely, I decide But, true to the compact, whose importance I now full appreciated, I flung aside my diplomatic weapons, r coiling, as strongly, or nearly as strongly, let us sa from any effort direct or indirect to gain informatic from such a source. It was not our fault if by her ow conversation and behaviour she gave us some idea of ho matters stood. Davies already knew more than I did.

We spent a few minutes on deck while she asked eag questions about our build and gear and seaworthines with a quaint mixture of professional acumen and pe sonal curiosity.

"How did you manage alone that day?" she aske Davies, suddenly.

"Oh, it was quite safe," was the reply. "But it much better to have a friend."

She looked at me; and—well, I would have died f
Davies there and then.

"Father said you would be safe," she remarked, wi decision—a slight excess of decision, I thought. An at that turned to some rope or block and pursued h questioning. She found the compass impressive, an the trappings of that hateful centre-board had a peculi fascination for her. Was this the way we did it England? was her constant query.

Yet, in spite of a superficial freedom, we were all sh and constrained. The descent below was a welcon diversion, for we should have been less than human we had not extracted some spontaneous fun from th humours of the saloon. I went down first to see abo the tea, leaving them struggling for mutual comprehensi over the theory of an English lifeboat. They soo ollowed, and I can see her now stooping in at the doorway, treading delicately, like a kitten, past the obstruc-ive centre-board to a place on the starboard sofa, then aking in her surroundings with a timid rapture that roke into delight at all the primitive arrangements and ingy amenities of our den. She explored the cavernous ecesses of the Rippingille, fingered the duck-guns and he miscellany in the racks, and peeped into the fo'c'sle with dainty awe. Everything was a source of merriment, from our cramped attitudes to the painful defiiency of spoons and the "yachtiness" (there is no ther word to describe it) of the bread, which had been ought at Bensersiel, and had suffered from incarceraion and the climate. This fact came out, and led to ome questions, while we waited for the water to boil, bout the gale and our visit there. The topic, a pregnant ne for us, appeared to have no special significance to er. At the mention of von Brüning she showed no motion of any sort; on the contrary, she went out f her way, from an innocent motive that anyone could ave guessed, to show that she could talk about him with dispassionate detachment.

"He came to see us when you were here last, didn't e?" she said to Davies. "He often comes. He goes with father to Memmert sometimes. You know about Memmert? They are diving for money out of an old wreck."

Yes, we had heard about it.

"Of course you have. Father is a director of the company, and Commander von Brüning takes great nterest in it; they took me down in a diving-bell once."

I murmured, "Indeed!" and Davies sawed laboriously
t the bread. She must have misconstrued our sheepish silence, for she stopped and drew herself up with just a touch of momentary hauteur, utterly lost on Davies. I could have laughed aloud at this transient little comedy of errors.

"Did you see any gold?" said Davies at last, with husky solemnity. Something had to be said or we should defeat our own end; but I let him say it. He had not my faith in Memmert.

"No, only mud and timber—oh, I forgot——"

"You mustn't betray the company's secrets," I said, laughing; "Commander von Brüning wouldn't tell us a word about the gold." ("There's self-denial!" I said to myself.)

"Oh, I don't think it matters much," she answered, laughing too. "You are only visitors."

"That's all," I remarked, demurely. "Just passing travellers."

"You will stop at Norderney?" she said, with naïve anxiety. "Herr Davies said——"

I looked to Davies; it was his affair. Fair and square came his answer, in blunt dog-German.

"Yes, of course, we shall. I should like to see your father again."

Up to this moment I had been doubtful of his final decision; for ever since our explanation at Bensersiel I had had the feeling that I was holding his nose to a very cruel grindstone. This straight word, clear and direct, beyond anything I had hoped for, brought me to my senses and showed me that his mind had been working far in advance of mine; and more, shaping a double purpose that I had never dreamt of.

"My father?" said Fräulein Dollmann; "yes, I am sure he will be very glad to see you."

There was no conviction in her tone, and her eyes were distant and troubled.

"He's not at home now, is he?" I asked.

"How did you know?" (a little maidenly confusion). "Oh, Commander von Brüning."

I might have added that it had been clear as daylight all along that this visit was in the nature of an escapade of which her father might not approve. I tried to say "I won't tell," without words, and may have succeeded.

"I told Mr. Davies when we first met," she went on. "I expect him back very soon—to-morrow in fact; he wrote from Amsterdam. He left me at Hamburg and has been away since. Of course, he will not know your yacht is back again. I think he expected Mr. Davies would stay in the Baltic, as the season was so late. But—but I am sure he will be glad to see you."

"Is the Medusa in harbour?" said Davies.

"Yes; but we are not living on her now. We are at our villa in the Schwannallée—my stepmother and I, that is." She added some details, and Davies gravely pencilled down the address on a leaf of the log-book; a formality which somehow seemed to regularise the present position.

"We shall be at Norderney to-morrow," he said.

Meanwhile the kettle was boiling merrily, and I made the tea—cocoa, I should say, for the menu was changed in deference to our visitor's tastes. "This is fun!" she said. And by common consent we abandoned ourselves, three youthful, hungry mariners, to the enjoyment of this impromptu picnic. Such a chance might never occur again—carpamus diem.

But the banquet was never celebrated. As at Belshazzar's feast, there was a writing on the wall; no supernatural inscription, but just a printed name; an English surname with title and initials, in cheap gilt lettering on the back of an old book; a silent, sneering witness of our snug party. The catastrophe came and passed so suddenly that at the time I had scarcely even an inkling of what caused it; but I know now that this is how it happened. Our visitor was sitting at the forward end of the starboard sofa, close to the bulkhead. Davies and I were opposite her. Across the bulkhead, on a level with our heads, ran the bookshelf, whose contents, remember, I had carefully straightened only half an hour ago, little dreaming of the consequence. Some trifle, probably the log-book which Davies had reached down from the shelf, called her attention to the rest of our library. While busied with the cocoa I heard her spelling out some titles, fingering leaves, and twitting Davies with the little care he took of his books. Suddenly there was a silence which made me look up, to see a startled and pitiful change in her. She was staring at Davies with wide eyes and parted lips, a burning flush mounting on her forehead, and such an expression on her face as a sleep-walker might wear, who wakes in fear he knows not where.

Half her mind was far away, labouring to construe some hideous dream of the past; half was in the present, cringing before some sickening reality. She remained so for perhaps ten seconds, and then—plucky girl that she was—she mastered herself, looked deliberately round and up with a circular glance, strangely in the manner of Davies himself, and spoke. How late it was, she must be going—her boat was not safe. At the same time she rose to go, or rather slid herself along the sofa, for rising was impossible. We sat like mannerless louts blank amazement. Davies at the outset had said, "What's the matter?" in plain English, and then relapsed into stupefaction. I recovered myself the first, and protested in some awkward fashion about the cocoa, the time, the absence of fog. In trying to answer, her self-possession broke down, poor child, and her retreat became a blind flight, like that of a wounded animal, while every sordid circumstance seemed to accentuate her panic.

She tilted the corner of the table in leaving the sofa and spilt cocoa over her skirt; she knocked her head with painful force against the sharp lintel of the doorway, and stumbled on the steps of the ladder. I was close behind, but when I reached the deck she was already on the counter hauling up the dinghy. She had even jumped in and laid hands on the sculls before any check came in her precipitate movements. Now there occurred to her the patent fact that the dinghy was ours, and that someone must accompany her to bring it back.

"Davies will row you over," I said.

"Oh no, thank you," she stammered. "If you will be so kind, Herr Carruthers. It is your turn. No, I mean, I want——"

"Go on," said Davies to me in English.

I stepped into the dinghy and motioned to take the sculls from her. She seemed not to see me, and pushed off while Davies handed down her jacket, which she had left in the cabin. Neither of us tried to better the situation by conventional apologies. It was left to her, at the last moment, to make a show of excusing herself, in an attempt so brave and yet so wretchedly lame that I tingled all over with hot shame. She only made matters worse, and Davies interrupted her.

"Auf Wiedersehen," he said, simply.

She shook her head, did not even offer her hand, and pulled away; Davies turned sharp round and went below.

There was now no muddy Rubicon to obstruct us, for the tide had risen a good deal, and the sands were covering. I offered again to take the sculls, but she took no notice and rowed on, so that I was a silent passenger on the stern seat till we reached her boat, a spruce little yacht's gig, built to the native model, with a spoon-bow and tiny lee-boards. It was already afloat, but riding quite safely to a rope and a little grapnel which she proceeded to haul in.

"It was quite safe after all, you see," I said.

"Yes, but I could not stay. Herr Carruthers, I want to say something to you." (I knew it was coming; von Brüning's warning over again.) "I made a mistake just now; it is no use your calling on us to-morrow."

"Why not?"

"You will not see my father."

"I thought you said he was coming back?"

"Yes, by the morning steamer; but he will be very busy."

"We can wait. We have several days to spare, and we have to call for letters anyhow."

"You must not delay on our account. The weather is very fine at last. It would be a pity to lose a chance of a smooth voyage to England. The season——"

"We have no fixed plans. Davies wants to get some shooting."

"My father will be much occupied."

"We can see you."

I insisted on being obtuse, for though this fencing

ith an unstrung girl was hateful work, the quest was stake. We were going to Norderney, come what ight, and sooner or later we must see Dollmann. It as no use promising not to. I had given no pledge von Brüning, and I would give none to her. The hly alternative was to violate the compact (which the resent fiasco had surely weakened), speak out, and try nd make an ally of her. Against her own father? I rank from the responsibility and counted the cost of ilure—certain failure, to judge by her conduct. She egan to hoist her lugsail in a dazed, shiftless fashion, hile our two boats drifted slowly to leeward.

"Father might not like it," she said, so low and from ch tremulous lips that I scarcely caught her words. He does not like foreigners much. I am afraid . . . e did not want to see Herr Davies again."

"But I thought——"

"It was wrong of me to come aboard—I suddenly membered; but I could not tell Herr Davies."

"I see," I answered. "I will tell him."

"Yes, that he must not come near us."

"He will understand. I know he will be very sorry, ut," I added, firmly, "you can trust him implicitly to o the right thing." And how I prayed that this would ntent her! Thank Heaven, it did.

"Yes," she said, "I am afraid I did not say good-bye him. You will do so?" She gave me her hand.

"One thing more," I added, holding it, "nothing had tter be said about this meeting?"

"No, no, nothing. It must never be known."

I let go the gig's gunwale and watched her tighten r sheet and make a tack or two to windward. Then rowed back to the Dulcibella as hard as I could.

CHAPTER XX

THE LITTLE DRAB BOOK

I FOUND Davies at the cabin table, surrounded with litter of books. The shelf was empty, and its conten were tossed about among the cups and on the floo We both spoke together.

"Well, what was it?"

"Well, what did she say?"

I gave way, and told my story briefly. He listene in silence, drumming on the table with a book which h held.

"It's not good-bye," he said. "But I don't wonder look here!" and he held out to me a small volum whose appearance was quite familiar to me, if its co tents were less so. As I noted in an early chapte Davies's library, excluding tide-tables, "pilots," etc was limited to two classes of books, those on naval wa fare, and those on his own hobby, cruising in sma yachts. He had six or seven of the latter, includin Knight's "Falcon in the Baltic," Cowper's "Sailin Tours," Macmullen's "Down Channel," and other les known stories of adventurous travel. I had scarcel done more than look into some of them at off-moment for our life had left no leisure for reading. This pa ticular volume was—no, I had better not describe it to fully; but I will say that it was old and unpretentiou bound in cheap cloth of a rather antiquated style, wit a title which showed it to be a guide for yachtsmen t a certain British estuary. A white label partly scratche away bore the legend "3*d*." I had glanced at it one or twice with no special interest.

" Well ? " I said, turning over some yellow pages.

" Dollmann ! " cried Davies. " Dollmann wrote it."

turned to the title-page, and read : " By Lieut. X——, .N." The name itself conveyed nothing to me, but began to understand. Davies went on : " The name's n the back, too—and I'm certain it's the last she looked t."

" But how do you know ? "

" And there's the man himself. Ass that I am not o have seen it before ! Look at the frontispiece."

It was a sorry piece of illustration of the old-fashioned ort, lacking definition and finish, but effective notwithtanding ; for it was evidently the reproduction, though cheap and imperfect process, of a photograph. It epresented a small yacht at anchor below some woods, ith the owner standing on deck in his shirt sleeves : well-knit, powerful man, young, of middle height, ean shaved. There appeared to be nothing remarkble about the face : the portrait being on too small a cale, and the expression, such as it was, being of the xed " photographic " character.

" How do you know him ? You said he was fifty, ith a greyish beard."

" By the shape of his head ; that hasn't changed. ook how it widens at the top, and then flattens—sort wedge shaped—with a high, steep forehead ; you'd rdly notice it in that " (the points were not very oticeable, but I saw what Davies meant). " The height nd figure are right, too ; and the dates are about right. ook at the bottom."

Underneath the picture was the name of a yacht and date. The publisher's date on the title-page was the me.

"Sixteen years ago," said Davies. "He looks thirty odd in that, doesn't he? And fifty now."

"Let's work the thing out. Sixteen years ago he was still an Englishman, an officer in Her Majesty's Navy. Now he's a German. At some time between this and then, I suppose, he came to grief—disgrace, flight, exile. When did it happen?"

"They've been here three years; von Brüning said so."

"It was long before that. She has talked German from a child. What's her age, do you think—nineteen or twenty?"

"About that."

"Say she was four when this book was published. The crash must have come not long after."

"And they've been hiding in Germany since."

"Is this a well-known book?"

"I never saw another copy; picked this up on a second-hand bookstall for threepence."

"She looked at it, you say?"

"Yes, I'm certain of it."

"Was she never on board you in September?"

"No; I asked them both, but Dollmann made excuses."

"But he—he came on board? You told me so."

"Once; he asked himself to breakfast on the first day. By Jove! yes; you mean he saw the book?"

"It explains a good deal."

"It explains everything."

We fell into deep reflection for a minute or two.

"Do you really mean everything?" I said. "In that case let's sail straight away and forget the whole affair. He's only some poor devil with a past, whose secret you stumbled on, and, half mad with fear, he tried to silence ou. But you don't want revenge, so it's no business ours. We can ruin him if we like; but is it worth it?"

"You don't mean a word you're saying," said Davies, though I know why you say it; and many thanks, old nap. I didn't mean 'everything.' He's plotting with ermans, or why did Grimm spy on us, and von Brüning ross-examine us? We've got to find out what he's at, s well as who he is. And as to her—what do you think f her now?"

I made my amende heartily. "Innocent and ignorant," as my verdict. "Ignorant, that is, of her father's easonable machinations; but aware, clearly, that they ere English refugees with a past to hide." I said other ings, but they do not matter. "Only," I concluded, it makes the dilemma infinitely worse."

"There's no dilemma at all," said Davies. "You id at Bensersiel that we couldn't hurt him without urting her. Well, all I can say is, we've got to. The me to cut and run, if ever, was when we sighted her inghy. I had a baddish minute then."

"She's given us a clue or two after all."

"It wasn't our fault. To refuse to have her on board ould have been to give our show away; and the very ct that she's given us clues decides the matter. She ustn't suffer for it."

"What will she do?"

"Stick to her father, I suppose."

"And what shall we do?"

"I don't know yet; how can I know? It depends," id Davies, slowly. "But the point is, that we have vo objects, equally important—yes, equally, by Jove! -to scotch him, and save her."

There was a pause.

"That's rather a large order," I observed. "Do you realise that at this very moment we have probably gained the first object? If we went home now, walked into the Admiralty and laid our facts before them, what would be the result?"

"The Admiralty!" said Davies, with ineffable scorn.

"Well, Scotland Yard, too, then. Both of them want our man, I dare say. It would be strange if between them they couldn't dislodge him, and, incidentally, either discover what's going on here or draw such attention to this bit of coast as to make further secrecy impossible."

"It's out of the question to let her betray her father, and then run away! Besides, we don't know enough, and they mightn't believe us. It's a cowardly course, however you look at it."

"Oh! that settles it," I answered, hastily. "Now I want to go back over the facts. When did you first see her?"

"That first morning."

"She wasn't in the saloon the night before?"

"No; and he didn't mention her."

"You would have gone away next morning if he hadn't called?"

"Yes; I told you so."

"He allowed her to persuade you to make that voyage with them?"

"I suppose so."

"But he sent her below when the pilotage was going on?"

"Of course."

"She said just now, 'Father said you would be safe.' What had you been saying to her?"

"It was when I met her on the sand. (By the way, wasn't a chance meeting; she had been making inuiries and heard about us from a skipper who had en the yacht near Wangeroog, and she had been down is way before.) She asked at once about that day, d began apologising, rather awkwardly, you know, for eir rudeness in not having waited for me at Cuxhaven. er father found he must get on to Hamburg at once."

"But you didn't go to Cuxhaven; you told her that? hat exactly did you tell her? This is important."

"I was in a fearful fix, not knowing what he had told r. So I said something vague, and then she asked the ry question von Brüning did, 'Wasn't there a schreck-h sea round the Scharhorn?'"

"She didn't know you took the short cut, then?"

"No; he hadn't dared to tell her."

"She knew that they took it?"

"Yes. He couldn't possibly have hidden that. She ould have known by the look of the sea from the portles, the shorter time, etc."

"But when the Medusa hove to and he shouted to you follow him—didn't she understand what was hapning?"

"No, evidently not. Mind you, she couldn't possibly ve heard what we said, in that weather, from below. couldn't cross-question her, but it was clear enough hat she thought; namely, that he had hove to for actly the opposite reason, to say he was taking the ort cut, and that I wasn't to attempt to follow him."

"That's why she laid stress on waiting for you at uxhaven?"

"Of course; mine would have been the longer passage."

"She had no notion of foul play?"

"None—that I could see. After all, there I was alive and well."

"But she was remorseful for having induced you t sail at all that day, and for not having waited to se you arrived safely."

"That's about it."

"Now what did you say about Cuxhaven?"

"Nothing. I let her understand that I went there and, not finding them, went on to the Baltic by the Eide river, having changed my mind about the ship canal."

"Now, what about her voyage back from Hamburg Was she alone?"

"No; the stepmother joined her."

"Did she say she had inquired about you at Bruns büttel?"

"No; I suppose she didn't like to. And there wa no need, because my taking the Eider explained it."

I reflected. "You're sure she hadn't a notion tha you took the short cut?"

"Quite sure; but she may guess it now. She guesse foul play by seeing that book."

"Of course she did; but I was thinking of somethin else. There are two stories afloat now—yours to vo Brüning, the true one, that you followed the Medus to the short cut; and Dollmann's to her, that you wen round the Scharhorn. That's evidently his version o the affair—the version he would have given if you ha been drowned and inquiries were ever made; the ver sion he would have sworn his crew to if they discovere the truth."

"But he must drop that yarn when he knows I'm alive and back again."

"Yes; but meanwhile, supposing von Brüning see him before he knows you're back again, and wants to find out the truth about that incident. If I were von Brüning I should say, 'By the way, what's become of that young Englishman you decoyed away to the Baltic?' Dollmann would give his version, and von Brüning, having heard ours, would know he was lying, and had tried to drown you."

"Does it matter? He must know already that Dollmann's a scoundrel."

"So we've been supposing; but we may be wrong. We're still in the dark as to Dollmann's position towards these Germans. They may not even know he's English, or they may know that and not know his real name and past. What effect your story will have on their relations with him we can't forecast. But I'm clear about one thing, that it's our paramount interest to maintain the status quo as long as we can, to minimise the danger you ran that day, and act as witnesses in his defence. We can't do that if his story and yours don't tally. The discrepancy will not only damn him (that may be immaterial), but it will throw doubt on us."

"Why?"

"Because if the short cut was so dangerous that he dared not own to having led you to it, it was dangerous enough to make you suspect foul play; the very supposition we want to avoid. We want to be thought mere travellers, with no scores to wipe out, and no secrets to pry after."

"Well, what do you propose?"

"Hitherto I believe we stand fairly well. Let's assume we hoodwinked von Brüning at Bensersiel, and base our policy on that assumption. It follows that we must show Dollmann at the earliest possible moment that you have come back, and give him time to revise his tactics before he commits himself. Now——"

"But she'll tell him we're back," interrupted Davies.

"I don't think so. We've just agreed to keep this afternoon's episode a secret. She expects never to see us again."

"Now, he comes to-morrow by the morning boat, she said. What did that mean? Boat from where?"

"I know. From Norddeich on the mainland opposite. There's a railway there from Norden, and a steam ferry crosses to the island."

"At what time?"

"Your Bradshaw will tell us—here it is: 'Winter Service, 8.30 a.m., due at 9.5.'"

"Let's get away at once."

We had a tussle with the tide at first, but once over the watershed the channel improved, and the haze lightened gradually. A lighthouse appeared among the sand-dunes on the island shore, and before darkness fell we dimly saw the spires and roofs of a town, and two long black piers stretching out southwards. We were scarcely a mile away when we lost our wind altogether, and had to anchor. Determined to reach our destination that night we waited till the ebb stream made, and then towed the yacht with the dinghy. In the course of this a fog dropped on us suddenly, just as it had yesterday. I was towing at the time, and, of course, stopped short; but Davies shouted to me from the tiller to go on, that he could manage with the lead and compass. And the end of it was that, at about nine o'clock, we anchored safely in the five-fathom roadstead, close to the eastern pier as a short reconnaissance proved to us. It had been a little masterpiece of adroit seamanship.

There was utter stillness till our chain rattled down, hen a muffled shout came from the direction of the ier, and soon we heard a boat groping out to us. It as a polite but sleepy port-officer, who asked in a per-unctory way for our particulars, and when he heard nem, remembered the Dulcibella's previous visit.

"Where are you bound to?" he asked.

"England—sooner or later," said Davies.

The man laughed derisively. "Not this year," he aid; "there will be fogs for another week; it is always o, and then storms. Better leave your yawl here. Dues will be only sixpence a month for you."

"I'll think about it," said Davies. "Good-night."

The man vanished like a ghost in the thick night.

"Is the post-office open?" I called after him.

"No; eight to-morrow," came back out of the fog.

We were too excited to sup in comfort, or sleep in eace, or to do anything but plan and speculate. Never ll this night had we talked with absolute mutual con-dence, for Davies broke down the last barriers of reserve nd let me see his whole mind. He loved this girl and e loved his country, two simple passions which for the me absorbed his whole moral capacity. There was no oom left for casuistry. To weigh one passion against he other, with the discordant voices of honour and ex-edience dinning in his ears, had too long involved him fruitless torture. Both were right; neither could be rrendered. If the facts showed them irreconcilable, nt pis pour les faits. A way must be found to satisfy oth or neither.

I should have been a spiritless dog if I had not risen o his mood. But in truth his cutting of the knot was at is juncture exactly what appealed to me. I, too, was tired of vicarious casuistry, and the fascination of our enterprise, intensified by the discovery of that afternoon, had never been so strong in me. Not to be insincere, I cannot pretend that I viewed the situation with his single mind. My philosophy when I left London was of a very worldly sort, and no one can change his temperament in three weeks. I plainly said as much to Davies, and indeed took perverse satisfaction in stating with brutal emphasis some social truths which bore on this attachment of his to the daughter of an outlaw. Truths I call them, but I uttered them more by rote than by conviction, and he heard them unmoved. And meanwhile I snatched recklessly at his own solution. If it imparted into our adventure a strain of crazy chivalry more suited to knights-errant of the middle ages than to sober modern youths—well, thank Heaven, I was not too sober, and still young enough to snatch at that fancy with an ardour of imagination, if not of character; perhaps, too, of character, for Galahads are not so common but that ordinary folk must needs draw courage from their example and put something of a blind trust in their tenfold strength.

To reduce a romantic ideal to a working plan is a very difficult thing.

"We shall have to argue backwards," I said. "What is to be the final stage? Because that must govern the others."

There was only one answer—to get Dollmann, secrets and all, daughter and all, away from Germany altogether. So only could we satisfy the double aim we had set before us. What a joy it is, when beset with doubts, to find a bed-rock necessity, however unattainable! We fastened on this one and reasoned back from it. The first lesson as that, however many and strong were the enemies e had to contend with, our sole overt foe must be Doll- ann. The issue of the struggle must be known only o ourselves and him. If we won, and found out "what e was at," we must at all costs conceal our success from is German friends, and detach him from them before he as compromised. (You will remark that to blithely ccept this limitation showed a very sanguine spirit in s.) The next question, how to find out what he was t, was a deal more thorny. If it had not been for the iscovery of Dollmann's identity, we should have found as hard a nut to crack as ever. But this discovery as illuminating. It threw into relief two methods of ction which hitherto we had been hazily seeking to ombine, seesawing between one and the other, each of s influenced at different times by different motives. ne was to rely on independent research; the other to xtort the secret from Dollmann direct, by craft or hreats. The moral of to-day was to abandon the first nd embrace the second.

The prospects of independent research were not a whit etter than before. There were only two theories in the eld, the channel theory and the Memmert theory. The ormer languished for lack of corroboration; the latter lso appeared to be weakened. To Fräulein Dollmann he wreck-works were evidently what they purported to e, and nothing more. This fact in itself was unim- ortant, for it was clear as crystal that she was no party o her father's treacherous intrigues, if he was engaged n such. But if Memmert was his sphere for them, it as disconcerting to find her so familiar with that sphere, ghtly talking of a descent in a diving-bell—hinting, too, hat the mystery as to results was only for local consumption. Nevertheless, the charm of Memmert as the plac we had traced Grimm to, and as the only tangible clu we had obtained, was still very great. The really cogen objection was the insuperable difficulty, known an watched as we were, of learning its significance. I there was anything important to see there we shoul never be allowed to see it, while by trying and failin we risked everything. It was on this point that th last of all misunderstandings between me and Davie was dissipated. At Bensersiel he had been influence more than he owned by my arguments about Memmert but at that time (as I hinted) he was biassed by radical prejudice. The channel theory had become sort of religion with him, promising double salvation—not only avoidance of the Dollmanns, but success in th quest by methods in which he was past master. T have to desert it and resort to spying on naval defence was an idea he dreaded and distrusted. It was not th morality of the course that bothered him. He was fa too clear-headed to blink at the essential fact that a heart we were spies on a foreign power in time of peac or to salve his conscience by specious distinctions as t our mode of operation. The foreign power to him wa Dollmann, a traitor. There was his final justificatio fearlessly adopted and held to the last. It was rath that, knowing his own limitations, his whole natu shrank from the sort of action entailed by the Memme theory. And there was strong common sense in h antipathy.

So much for independent research.

On the other hand the road was now clear for the oth method. Davies no longer feared to face the imbrogli at Norderney; and that day fortune had given us

ew and potent weapon against Dollmann; precisely ow potent we could not tell, for we had only a glimpse f his past, and his exact relations with the Government ere unknown to us. But we knew who he was. Using his knowledge with address, could we not wring the est from him? Feel our way, of course, be guided by is own conduct, but in the end strike hard and stake verything on the stroke? Such at any rate was our cheme to-night. Later, tossing in my bunk, I bethought me of the little drab book, lit a candle, and etched it. A preface explained that it had been written uring a spell of two months' leave from naval duty, nd expressed a hope that it might be of service to orinthian sailors. The style was unadorned, but cholarly and pithy. There was no trace of the writer's ndividuality, save a certain subdued relish in describing anks and shoals, which reminded me of Davies himself. or the rest, I found the book dull, and, in fact, it sent ne to sleep.

CHAPTER XXI

BLINDFOLD TO MEMMERT

"HERE she comes," said Davies. It was nine o'clock n the next day, October 22nd, and we were on deck aiting for the arrival of the steamer from Norddeich. here was no change in the weather—still the same ringent cold, with a high barometer, and only fickle aws of air; but the morning was gloriously clear, except r a wreath or two of mist curling like smoke from the ea, and an attenuated belt of opaque fog on the northern orizon. The harbour lay open before us, and very ommodious and civilised it looked, enclosed between two long piers which ran quite half a mile out from the land to the roadstead (Riff-Gat, by name) where we lay. A stranger might have taken it for a deep and spacious haven; but this, of course, was an illusion, due to the high water. Davies knew that three-quarters of it was mud, the remainder being a dredged-out channel along the western pier. A couple of tugs, a dredger, and a ferry packet with steam up, were moored on that side—a small stack of galliots on the other. Beyond these was another vessel, a galliot in build, but radiant as a queen among sluts; her varnished sides and spars flashing orange in the sun. These and her snow-white sail-covers and the twinkle of brass and gun-metal, proclaimed her to be a yacht. I had already studied her through the glasses and read on her stern Medusa. A couple of sailors were swabbing her decks; you could hear the sluish of the water and the scratching of the deck-brooms. "They can see us anyway," Davies had said.

For that matter all the world could see us—certainly the incoming steamer must: for we lay as near to the pier as safety permitted, abreast of the berth she would occupy, as we knew by a gangway and a knot of sailors.

A packet boat, not bigger than a big tug, was approaching from the south.

"Remember, we're not supposed to know he's coming," I said; "let's go below." Besides the skylight our "coach-house" cabin top had little oblong side windows. We wiped clean those on the port side and watched events from them, kneeling on the sofa.

The steamer backed her paddles, flinging out a wash that set us rolling to our scuppers. There seemed to be very few passengers aboard, but all of them were gazing the Dulcibella while the packet was warped alongside. n the forward deck there were some market-women with ıskets, a postman, and a weedy youth who might be ı hotel waiter; on the after-deck, standing close to-ther, were two men in ulsters and soft felt hats.

"There he is!" said Davies, in a tense whisper; "the ll one." But the tall one turned abruptly as Davies oke and strode away behind the deck-house, leaving e just a lightning impression of a grey beard and a eep tanned forehead, behind a cloud of cigar smoke. was perverse of me, but, to tell the truth, I hardly issed him, so occupied was I by the short one, who mained leaning on the rail, thoughtfully contemplating e Dulcibella through gold-rimmed pince-nez: a sallow, izened old fellow, beetle-browed, with a bush of grizzled oustache and a jet-black tuft of beard on his chin. ne most remarkable feature was the nose, which was oad and flat, merging almost imperceptibly in the rinkled cheeks. Lightly beaked at the nether ex-emity, it drooped towards an enormous cigar which as pointing at us like a gun just discharged. He looked ise as Satan, and you would say he was smiling in-ardly.

"Who's that?" I whispered to Davies. (There was o need to talk in whispers, but we did so instinc-vely.)

"Can't think," said Davies. "Hullo! she's backing f, and they've not landed."

Some parcels and mail-bags had been thrown up, and e weedy waiter and two market-women had gone up e gangway, which was now being hauled up, and were anding on the quay. I think one or two other persons ıd first come aboard unnoticed by us, but at the last moment a man we had not seen before jumped down to the forward deck. "Grimm!" we both ejaculated at once.

The steamer whistled sharply, circled backwards into the roadstead, and then steamed away. The pier soon hid her, but her smoke showed she was steering towards the North Sea.

"What does this mean?" I asked.

"There must be some other quay to stop at nearer the town," said Davies. "Let's go ashore and get your letters."

We had made a long and painful toilette that morning, and felt quite shy of one another as we sculled towards the pier, in much-creased blue suits, conventional collars, and brown boots. It was the first time for two years that I had seen Davies in anything approaching a respectable garb; but a fashionable watering-place, even in the dead season, exacts respect; and, besides, we had friends to visit.

We tied up the dinghy to an iron ladder, and on the pier found our inquisitor of the night before smoking in the doorway of a shed marked "Harbour Master." After some civilities we inquired about the steamer. The answer was that it was Saturday, and she had, therefore, gone on to Juist. Did we want a good hotel? The "Vier Jahreszeiten" was still open, etc.

"Juist, by Jove!" said Davies, as we walked on. "Why are those three going to Juist?"

"I should have thought it was pretty clear. They're on their way to Memmert."

Davies agreed, and we both looked longingly westward at a straw-coloured streak on the sea.

"Is it some meeting, do you think?" said Davies.

Looks like it. We shall probably find the Kormoran ee, wind-bound."

and find her we did soon after, the outermost of the ck of galliots, on the farther side of the harbour. Two n, whose faces we took a good look at, were sitting her hatch, mending a sail.

Flooded with sun, yet still as the grave, the town s like a dead butterfly for whom the healing rays had ne too late. We crossed some deserted public gar- s commanded by a gorgeous casino, its porticos ped with chairs and tables; so past kiosques and és, great white hotels with boarded windows, bazaars l booths, and all the stale lees of vulgar frivolity, to post-office, which at least was alive. I received a cket of letters and purchased a local time-table, from ich we learned that the steamer sailed daily to Borkum Norderney, touching three times a week at Juist eather permitting). On the return journey to-day it s due at Norderney at 7.30 p.m. Then I inquired the y to the "Vier Jahreszeiten." "For whatever your nciples, Davies," I said, "we are going to have the t breakfast money can buy! We've got the whole before us."

The "Four Seasons" Hotel was on the esplanade ing the northern beach. Living up to its name, it nounced on an illuminated sign-board, "Inclusive ns for winter visitors; special attention to invalids, " Here in a great glass restaurant, with the un- ded blue of ocean spread out before us, we ate the g of breakfasts, dismissed the waiter, and over long fragrant Havanas examined my mail at leisure.

What a waste of good diplomacy!" was my first ught; for nothing had been tampered with, so far as we could judge from the minutest scrutiny, directed of course, in particular to the franked official letter (for to my surprise there were two) from Whitehall.

The first in order of date (Oct. 6th) ran: "Dear Carruthers.—Take another week by all means.—Yours etc."

The second (marked "urgent") had been sent to my home address and forwarded. It was dated October 15th, and cancelled the previous letter, requesting me to return to London without delay—"I am sorry to abridge your holiday, but we are very busy, and, at present, short-handed.—Yours, etc." There was a dry postscript to the effect that another time I was to be good enough to leave more regular and definite information as to my whereabouts when absent.

"I'm afraid I never got this!" I said, handing it to Davies.

"You won't go, will you?" said he, looking, nevertheless, with unconcealed awe at the great man's hand writing under the haughty official crest. Meanwhile I discovered an endorsement on a corner of the envelope. "Don't worry; it's only the chief's fuss.—M——" promptly tore up the envelope. There are domestic mysteries which it would be indecent and disloyal to reveal, even to one's best friend. The rest of my letters need no remark; I smiled over some and blushed over others—all were voices from a life which was infinitely far away. Davies, meanwhile, was deep in the foreign intelligence of a newspaper, spelling it out line by line and referring impatiently to me for the meaning of words.

"Hullo!" he said, suddenly; "same old game. Hear that siren?"

A curtain of fog had grown on the northern horizon
d was drawing shorewards slowly but surely.

" It doesn't matter, does it ? " I said.

" Well, we must get back to the yacht. We can't ve her alone in the fog."

There was some marketing to be done on the way ck, and in the course of looking for the shops we wanted
: came on the Schwannallée and noted its position.
fore we reached the harbour the fog was on us, charg-g up the streets in dense masses. Happily a trame led right up to the pier-head, or we should have lost r way and wasted time, which, in the event, was of iceless value. Presently we stumbled up against the arbour Office, which was our landmark for the steps ere we had tied up the dinghy. The same official peared and good-naturedly held the painter while we nded in our parcels. He wanted to know why we d left the flesh-pots of the " Vier Jahreszeiten." To k after our yacht, of course. There was no need, he jected ; there would be no traffic moving while the g lasted, and the fog, having come on at that hour, d come to stay. If it did clear he would keep an e on the yacht for us. We thanked him, but thought would go aboard.

" You'll have a job to find her now," he said.

The distance was eighty yards at the most, but we d to use a scientific method, the same one, in fact, at Davies had used last night in the approach to the stern pier.

" Row straight out at right angles to the pier," he d now. I did so, Davies sounding with his scull be-een the strokes. He found the bottom after twenty rds, that being the width of the dredged-out channel at this point. Then we turned to the right, and mov gently forward, keeping touch with the edge of t mud-bank (for all the world like blind men tappi along a kerbstone) and taking short excursions from till the Dulcibella hove in view. "That's partly luc Davies commented; "we ought to have had the comp as well."

We exchanged shouts with the man on the pier show we had arrived.

"It's very good practice, that sort of thing," s Davies, when we had disembarked.

"You've got a sixth sense," I observed. "How could you go like that?"

"Don't know. Let's have another try. I can't still all day. Let's explore this channel."

"Why not go to Memmert?" I said, in fun.

"To Memmert?" said Davies, slowly; "by Jov that's an idea!"

"Good Heavens, man! I was joking. Why, it's mortal miles."

"More," said Davies, absently. "It's not so mu the distance—what's the time? Ten fifteen; quar ebb—— What am I talking about? We made plans last night."

But seeing him, to my amazement, serious, I v stung by the splendour of the idea I had awaken Confidence in his skill was second nature to me. I sw straight on to the logic of the thing, the greatness, completeness of the opportunity, if by a miracle it co be seized and used. Something was going on at Me mert to-day: our men had gone there; here were ten miles away, in a smothering, blinding fog. It known we were here—Dollmann and Grimm knew ıe crew of the Medusa knew it; the crew of the Kor-oran knew it; the man on the pier, whether he cared r not, knew it. But none of them knew Davies as I ıew him. Would anyone dream for an instant——?

" Stop a second," said Davies; " give me two minutes."

le whipped out the German chart. " Where exactly ıould we go?" (" Exactly!" The word tickled me ıgely.)

" To the depôt, of course; it's our only chance."

" Listen then—there are two routes: the outside one y the open sea, right round Juist, and doubling south * -the simplest, but the longest; the depôt's at the south ɔint of Memmert, and Memmert's nearly two miles ŋg."

" How far would that way be?"

" Sixteen miles good. And we should have to row a breaking swell most of the way, close to land."

" Out of the question; it's too public, too, if it clears. he steamer went that way, and will come back that ay. We must go inside over the sands. Am I dream-g, though? Can you possibly find the way?"

" I shouldn't wonder. But I don't believe you see ıe hitch. It's the time and the falling tide. High ater was about 8.15; it's now 10.15, and all those ınds are drying off. We must cross the See-Gat and rike that boomed channel, the Memmert Balje; strike , freeze on to it—can't cut off an inch—and pass that watershed' you see there before it's too late. It's ı infernally bad one, I can see. Not even a dinghy ill cross it for an hour each side of low water."

" Well, how far is the 'watershed'?"

" Good Lord! What are we talking for? Change, man, change! Talk while we're changing." (He beg flinging off his shore clothes, and I did the same.) "I at least five miles to the end of it; six, allowing f bends; hour and a half hard pulling; two, allowi for checks. Are you fit? You'll have to pull the mo Then there are six or seven more miles—easier on And then—— What are we to do when we get there?

* See Chart B.

"Leave that to me," I said. "You get me there."

"Supposing it clears?"

"After we get there? Bad; but we must risk tha If it clears on the way there it doesn't matter by th route; we shall be miles from land."

"What about getting back?"

"We shall have a rising tide, anyway. If the f lasts—can you manage in a fog and dark?"

"The dark makes it no more difficult, if we've light to see the compass and chart by. You trim t binnacle lamp—no, the riding-light. Now give me t scissors, and don't speak a word for ten minutes. Mea while, think it out, and load the dinghy—(by Jov though, don't make a sound)—some grub and whisk the boat-compass, lead, riding-light, matches, small boa hook, grapnel and line."

"Foghorn?"

"Yes, and the whistle too."

"A gun?"

"What for?"

"We're after ducks."

"All right. And muffle the rowlocks with cotto waste."

I left Davies absorbed in the charts, and softly we about my own functions. In ten minutes he was on t ladder, beckoning.

"I've done," he whispered. "Now shall we go?"

"I've thought it out. Yes," I answered.

This was only roughly true, for I could not have ated in words all the pros and cons that I had balanced. was an impulse that drove me forward; but an pulse founded on reason, with just a tinge, perhaps, superstition; for the quest had begun in a fog and ight fitly end in one.

It was twenty-five minutes to eleven when we noise-ssly pushed off. "Let her drift," whispered Davies, the ebb'll carry her past the pier."

We slid by the Dulcibella, and she disappeared. Then e sat without speech or movement for about five inutes, while the gurgle of tide through piles approached id passed. The dinghy appeared to be motionless, st as a balloon in the clouds may appear to its occu-nts to be motionless, though urged by a current of r. In reality we were driving out of the Riff-Gat to the See-Gat. The dinghy swayed to a light swell.

"Now, pull," said Davies, under his breath; "keep long and steady, above all steady—both arms with ual force."

I was on the bow-thwart; he vis-à-vis to me on the ern seat, his left hand behind him on the tiller, his ght forefinger on a small square of paper which lay his knees; this was a section cut out from the g German chart (Chart B). On the midship-thwart tween us lay the compass and a watch. Between ese three objects—compass, watch, and chart—his eyes rted constantly, never looking up or out, save occa-nally for a sharp glance over the side at the flying bbles, to see if I was sustaining a regular speed. My ty was to be his automaton, the human equivalent of a marine engine whose revolutions can be count and used as data by the navigator. My arms must regular as twin pistons; the energy that drove th as controllable as steam. It was a hard ideal to rea for the complex mortal tends to rely on all the sen God has given him, so unfitting himself for mechani exactitude when a sense (eyesight, in my case) fa him. At first it was constantly "left" or "right" fr Davies, accompanied by a bubbling from the rudder.

"This won't do, too much helm," said Davies, wi out looking up. "Keep your stroke, but listen to r Can you see the compass card?"

"When I come forward."

"Take your time, and don't get flurried, but ea time you come forward have a good look at it. T course is sou'-west half-west. You take the opposi north-east half-east, and keep her stern on that. I be rough, but it'll save some helm, and give me a ha free if I want it."

I did as he said, not without effort, and our progr gradually became smoother, till he had no need to spe at all. The only sound now was one like the gen simmer of a saucepan away to port—the lisp of sur knew it to be—and the muffled grunt of the rowloc I broke the silence once to say "It's very shallow." had touched sand with my right scull.

"Don't talk," said Davies.

About half an hour passed, and then he added sou ing to his other occupations. "Plump" went the le at regular intervals, and he steered with his hip wh pulling in the line. Very little of it went out at fi then less still. Again I struck bottom, and, glanc aside, saw weeds. Suddenly he got a deep cast, and ghy, freed from the slight drag which shallow water ways inflicts on a small boat, leapt buoyantly forward. the same time, I knew by boils on the smooth surface t we were in a strong tideway.

'The Buse Tief," * muttered Davies. "Row hard w, and steady as a clock."

For a hundred yards or more I bent to my sculls d made her fly. Davies was getting six fathom ts, till, just as suddenly as it had deepened, the water aled—ten feet, six, three, one—the dinghy grounded.

"Good!" said Davies. "Back her off! Pull your ht only." The dinghy spun round with her bow to N.W. "Both arms together! Don't you worry out the compass now; just pull, and listen for orders. ere's a tricky bit coming."

He put aside the chart, kicked the lead under the t, and, kneeling on the dripping coils of line, sounded ntinuously with the butt-end of the boat-hook, a mpy little implement, notched at intervals of a foot, d often before used for the same purpose. All at ce I was aware that a check had come, for the dinghy erved and doubled like a hound ranging after scent.

'Stop her," he said, suddenly, "and throw out the pnel."

I obeyed and we brought up, swinging to a slight rrent, whose direction Davies verified by the com-ss. Then for half a minute he gave himself up to ncentrated thought. What struck me most about n was that he never for a moment strained his eyes ough the fog; a useless exercise (for five yards or so s the radius of our vision) which, however, I could help indulging in, while I rested. He made up his mind, and we were off again, straight and swift as a arrow this time, and in water deeper than the boathoo I could see by his face that he was taking some bo expedient whose issue hung in the balance. . . . Aga we touched mud, and the artist's joy of achieveme shone in his eyes. Backing away, we headed west, a for the first time he began to gaze into the fog.

* See Chart B.

"There's one!" he snapped at last. "Easy all!"

A boom, one of the usual upright saplings, glided o of the mist. He caught hold of it, and we brought up

"Rest for three minutes now," he said. "We're fairly good time."

It was 11.10. I ate some biscuits and took a nip whisky while Davies prepared for the next stage.

We had reached the eastern outlet of Memmert Bal the channel which runs east and west behind Jui Island, direct to the south point of Memmert. How had reached it was incomprehensible to me at the tim but the reader will understand by comparing my na rative with the dotted line on the chart. I add th brief explanation, that Davies's method had been cross the channel called the Buse Tief, and strike t other side of it at a point well south of the outlet of t Memmert Balje (in view of the northward set of t ebb-tide), and then to drop back north and feel his w to the outlet. The check was caused by a deep i dentation in the Itzendorf Flat; a cul-de-sac, with wide mouth, which Davies was very near mistaki for the Balje itself. We had no time to skirt dents deep as that; hence the dash across its mouth with t chance of missing the upper lip altogether, and of eith being carried out to sea (for the slightest error w cumulative) or straying fruitlessly along the edge.

The next three miles were the most critical of all. ey included the "watershed," whose length and pth were doubtful; they included, too, the crux of e whole passage, a spot where the channel forks, our n branch continuing west, and another branch diverg- g from it north-westward. We must row against ne, and yet we must negotiate that crux. Add to is that the current was against us till the watershed as crossed; that the tide was just at its most baffling age, too low to allow us to risk short cuts, and too gh to give definition to the banks of the channel; d that the compass was no aid whatever for the minor nds. "Time's up," said Davies, and on we went. I as hugging the comfortable thought that we should w have booms on our starboard for the whole distance; our starboard, I say, for experience had taught us at all channels running parallel with the coast d islands were uniformly boomed on the northern le. Anyone less confident than Davies would have ccumbed to the temptation of slavishly relying on ese marks, creeping from one to the other, and wasting ecious time. But Davies knew our friend the "boom" d his eccentricities too well; and preferred to trust his sense of touch, which no fog in the world could pair. If we happened to sight one, well and good, e should know which side of the channel we were on. t even this contingent advantage he deliberately crificed after a short distance, for he crossed over to e south or unboomed side and steered and sounded ng it, using the Itzendorf Flat as his handrail, so to eak. He was compelled to do this, he told me after- rds, in view of the crux, where the converging lines booms would have involved us in irremediable confusion. Our branch was the southern one, and it f lowed that we must use the southern bank, and de obtaining any help from booms until sure we were p that critical spot.

For an hour we were at the extreme strain, I physical exertion, he of mental. I could not get i a steady swing, for little checks were constant.
right scull was for ever skidding on mud or weeds, a the backward suck of shoal water clogged our progre Once we were both of us out in the slime tugging the dinghy's sides; then in again, blundering on.
found the fog bemusing, lost all idea of time and spa and felt like a senseless marionette kicking and jerk to a mad music without tune or time. The misty fo of Davies as he sat with his right arm swinging rhy mically forward and back, was a clockwork figure mad as myself, but didactic and gibbering in his m ness. Then the boathook he wielded with a circu sweep began to take grotesque shapes in my hea fancy; now it was the antenna of a groping insect, n the crank of a cripple's self-propelled perambulator, n the alpenstock of a lunatic mountaineer, who sits in chair and climbs and climbs to some phantom "wat shed." At the back of such mind as was left me lod two insistent thoughts: "we must hurry on," " are going wrong." As to the latter, take a link-b through a London fog and you will experience the sa thing; he always goes the way you think is wro
"We're rowing back!" I remember shouting to Dav once, having become aware that it was now my scull which splashed against obstructions. "Rubbis said Davies, "I've crossed over"; and I relapsed.

By degrees I returned to sanity, thanks to impro nditions. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good, il the state of the tide, though it threatened us with al failure, had the compensating advantage that the wer it fell the more constricted and defined became r channel; till the time came when the compass and at-hook were alike unnecessary, because our hand- l, the muddy brink of the channel, was visible to the e, close to us; on our right hand always now, for the ux was far behind, and the northern side was now r guide. All that remained was to press on with ght and main ere the bed of the creek dried.

What a race it was! Homeric, in effect; a struggle men with gods, for what were the gods but forces of ture personified? If the God of the Falling Tide did t figure in the Olympian circle he is none the less a ghty divinity. Davies left his post, and rowed stroke. nder our united efforts the dinghy advanced in strenu- s leaps, hurling miniature-rollers on the bank beside . My palms, seasoned as they were, were smarting th watery blisters. The pace was too hot for my ength and breath.

"I must have a rest," I gasped.

"Well, I think we're over it," said Davies.

We stopped the dinghy dead, and he stabbed over the le with the boat-hook. It passed gently astern of us, d even my bewildered brain took in the meaning of at.

"Three feet and the current with us. Well over it," said. "I'll paddle on while you rest and feed."

It was a few minutes past one and we still, as he culated, had eight miles before us, allowing for bends.

"But it's a mere question of muscle," he said.

I took his word for it, and munched at tongue and biscuits. As for muscle, we were both in hard co dition. He was fresh, and what distress I felt w mainly due to spasmodic exertion culminating in th desperate spurt. As for the fog, it had more than on shown a faint tendency to lift, growing thinner a more luminous, in the manner of fogs, always to sett down again, heavy as a quilt.

Note the spot marked "second rest" (approximatel correct, Davies says) and the course of the channel fro that point westward. You will see it broadening a deepening to the dimensions of a great river, and finall merging in the estuary of the Ems. Note, too, that i northern boundary, the edge of the now uncovere Nordland Sand, leads, with one interruption (marke A), direct to Memmert, and is boomed throughout. Yo will then understand why Davies made so light of th rest of his problem. Compared with the feats he ha performed, it was child's play, for he always had th visible margin to keep touch with if he chose, or t return to in case of doubt. As a matter of fact—obser our dotted line—he made two daring departures fro it, the first purely to save time, the second partly t save time and partly to avoid the very awkward sp marked A, where a creek with booms and a little del of its own interrupts the even bank. During the fir of these departures—the shortest but most brilliant- he let me do the rowing, and devoted himself to th niceties of the course; during the second, and throug both the intermediate stages, he rowed himself, wit occasional pauses to inspect the chart. We fell into long, measured stroke, and covered the miles rapidl scarcely exchanging a single word till, at the end of long pull through vacancy, Davies said, suddenly :—

" Now where are we to land ? "

A sandbank was looming over us crowned by a lonely oom.

" Where are we ? "

" A quarter of a mile from Memmert."

" What time is it ? "

" Nearly three."

CHAPTER XXII

THE QUARTETTE

Is tour de force was achieved, and for the moment omething like collapse set in.

" What in the world have we come here for ? " he uttered ; " I feel a bit giddy."

I made him drink some whisky, which revived him ; nd then, speaking in whispers, we settled certain points. I alone was to land. Davies demurred to this out of yalty, but common sense, coinciding with a strong version of his own, settled the matter. Two were more able to detection than one. I spoke the language well, nd if challenged could cover my retreat with a gruff ord or two ; in my woollen overalls, sea-boots, oilskin at, with a sou'-wester pulled well over my eyes, I ould pass in a fog for a Frisian. Davies must mind e dinghy ; but how was I to regain it ? I hoped to do without help, by using the edge of the sand ; but if e heard a long whistle he was to blow the foghorn.

" Take the pocket-compass," he said. " Never budge om the shore without using it, and lay it on the ground r steadiness. Take this scrap of chart, too—it may me in useful ; but you can't miss the depôt, it looks be close to the shore. How long will you be ? "

"How long have I got?"

"The young flood's making—has been for nearly hour—that bank (he measured it with his eye) will covering in an hour and a half."

"That ought to be enough."

"Don't run it too fine. It's steep here, but it m shelve further on. If you have to wade you'll nev find me, and you'll make a deuce of a row. Got yo watch, matches, knife? No knife? Take mine; nev go anywhere without a knife." (It was his seaman idea of efficiency.)

"Wait a bit, we must settle a place to meet at case I'm late and can't reach you here."

"Don't be late. We've got to get back to the yac before we're missed."

"But I may have to hide and wait till dark—the f may clear."

"We were fools to come, I believe," said Davi gloomily. "There are no meeting-places in a place li this. Here's the best I can see on the chart—a b triangular beacon marked on the very point of Memme You'll pass it."

"All right. I'm off."

"Good luck," said Davies, faintly.

I stepped out, climbed a miry glacis of five or six fe reached hard wet sand, and strode away with the slugg ripple of the Balje on my left hand. A curtain dropp between me and Davies, and I was alone—alone, b how I thrilled to feel the firm sand rustle under boots; to know that it led to dry land, where, wh ever befell, I could give my wits full play. I clove t fog briskly.

Good Heavens! what was that? I stopped sh

I listened. From over the water on my left there g out, dulled by fog, but distinct to the ear, three ible strokes on a bell or gong. I looked at my watch. "Ship at anchor," I said to myself. "Six bells in e afternoon watch." I knew the Balje was here a ep roadstead, where a vessel entering the Eastern ns might very well anchor to ride out a fog.

I was just stepping forward when another sound lowed from the same quarter, a bugle-call this time. en I understood—only men-of-war sound bugles—the itz was here then; and very natural, too, I thought, d strode on. The sand was growing drier, the water ther beneath me; then came a thin black ribbon of ed—high-water mark. A few cautious steps to the ht and I touched tufts of marram grass. It was mmert. I pulled out the chart and refreshed my mory. No! there could be no mistake; keep the on my left and I must go right. I followed the bon of weed, keeping it just in view, but walking on e verge of the grass for the sake of silence. All at ce I almost tripped over a massive iron bar; others, rusty network of them, grew into being above and und me, like the arms of a ghostly polyp.

'What infernal spider's web is this?" I thought, I stumbled clear. I had strayed into the base of a antic tripod, its gaunt legs stayed and cross-stayed, apex lost in fog; the beacon, I remembered. A ndred yards further and I was down on my knees in, listening with might and main; for several little nds were in the air—voices, the rasp of a boat's keel, whistling of a tune. These were straight ahead. re to the left, seaward, that is, I had aural evidence the presence of a steamboat—a small one, for the hiss of escaping steam was low down. On my right fron I as yet heard nothing, but the depôt must be there.

I prepared to strike away from my base, and la the compass on the ground—N.W. roughly I made th course. ("South-east—south-east for coming back," repeated inwardly, like a child learning a lesson.) The of my two allies I abandoned one, the beach, and thre myself wholly on the fog.

"Play the game," I said to myself. "Nobody e pects you; nobody will recognise you."

I advanced in rapid stages of ten yards or so, whi grass disappeared and soft sand took its place, pitte everywhere with footmarks. I trod carefully, for obstru tions began to show themselves—an anchor, a heap rusty cable; then a boat bottom upwards, and, lyin on it, a foul old meerschaum pipe. I paused here an strained my ears, for there were sounds in many dire tions; the same whistling (behind me now), heavy foo steps in front, and somwhere beyond—fifty yards awa I reckoned—a buzz of guttural conversation; from th same quarter there drifted to my nostrils the acr odour of coarse tobacco. Then a door banged.

I put the compass in my pocket (thinking "sout east, south-east"), placed the pipe between my tee (ugh! the rank savour of it!) rammed my sou'-west hard down, and slouched on in the direction of th door that had banged. A voice in front called, "Ka Schicker"; a nearer voice, that of the man who footsteps I had heard approaching, took it up and calle "Karl Schicker"; I, too, took it up, and, turning m back, called "Karl Schicker" as gruffly and guttural as I could. The footsteps passed quite close to me, an glancing over my shoulder I saw a young man passin essed very like me, but wearing a sealskin cap instead a sou'-wester. As he walked he seemed to be count-g coins in his palm. A hail came back from the beach ıd the whistling stopped.

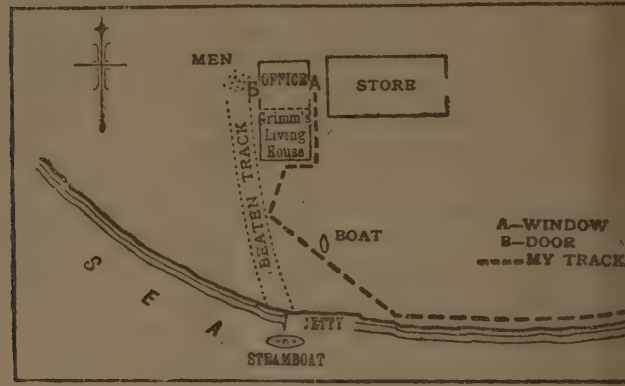
I now became aware that I was on a beaten track. hese meetings were hazardous, so I inclined aside, but ot without misgivings, for the path led towards the uzz of talk and the banging door, and these were my nly guides to the depôt. Suddenly, and much before expected it, I knew rather than saw that a wall was front of me; now it was visible, the side of a low uilding of corrugated iron. A pause to reconnoitre as absolutely necessary; but the knot of talkers might ave heard my footsteps, and I must at all costs not uggest the groping of a stranger. I lit a match—two—nd sucked heavily (as I had seen navvies do) at my ipe, studying the trend of the wall by reference to the ounds. There was a stale dottle wedged in the bowl, nd loathsome fumes resulted. Just then the same oor banged again; another name, which I forget, was lled out. I decided that I was at the end of a rec-ngular building which I pictured as like an Aldershot hut," and that the door I heard was round the corner my left. A knot of men must be gathered there, ntering it by turns. Having expectorated noisily, I llowed the tin wall to my right, and turning a corner rolled leisurely on, passing signs of domesticity, a wash-ıb, a water-butt, then a tiled approach to an open door. now was aware of the corner of a second building, also zinc, parallel to the first, but taller, for I could only st see the eave. I was just going to turn off to this a more promising field for exploration, when I heard window open ahead of me in my original building.

I am afraid I am getting obscure, so I append a rou sketch of the scene, as I partly saw and chiefly imagi it. It was window (A) that I heard open. From i could just distinguish through the fog a hand protru and throw something out—a cigar-end? The hand clean one with a gold signet-ring, rested for an inst afterwards on the sash, and then closed the window.



My geography was clear now in one respect. T window belonged to the same room as the bang door (B); for I distinctly heard the latter open a shut again, opposite me on the other side of the buildi It struck me that it might be interesting to see into t room. "Play the game," I reminded myself, and treated a few yards back on tiptoe, then turned a sauntered coolly past the window, puffing my villain pipe and taking a long deliberate look into the inte as I passed—the more deliberate that at the first inst I realised that nobody inside was disturbing him about me. As I had expected (in view of the fog a e time) there was artificial light within. My mental otograph was as follows: a small room with varnished al walls and furnished like an office; in the far right-nd corner a counting-house desk, Grimm sitting at it a high stool, side-face to me, counting money; oppo-e him in an awkward attitude a burly fellow in sea-an's dress holding a diver's helmet. In the middle of e room a deal table, and on it something big and black. lling on chairs near it, their backs to me and their ces turned towards the desk and the diver, two men von Brüning and an older man with a bald yellow ad (Dollmann's companion on the steamer, beyond a ubt). On another chair, with its back actually tilted ainst the window, Dollmann.

Such were the principal features of the scene; for tail I had to make another inspection. Stooping low, rept back, quiet as a cat, till I was beneath the window, d, as I calculated, directly behind Dollmann's chair. ien with great caution I raised my head. There was ly one pair of eyes in the room that I feared in the ast, and that was Grimm's, who sat in profile to me, thest away. I instantly put Dollmann's back be-een Grimm and me, and then made my scrutiny. As nade it, I could feel a cold sweat distilling on my fore-ad and tickling my spine; not from fear or excitement, t from pure ignominy. For beyond all doubt I was esent at the meeting of a bona-fide salvage company. was pay-day, and the directors appeared to be taking ck of work done; that was all.

Over the door was an old engraving of a two-decker der full sail; pinned on the wall a chart and the n of a ship. Relics of the wrecked frigate abounded. a shelf above the stove was a small pyramid of encrusted cannon-balls, and supported on nails at od places on the walls were corroded old pistols, and wh

I took to be the remains of a sextant. In a corner the floor sat a hoary little carronade, carriage and a None of these things affected me so much as a pile lumber on the floor, not firewood but unmistakab wreck-wood, black as bog-oak, still caked in places wi the mud of ages. Nor was it the mere sight of th lumber that dumbfounded me. It was the fact th a fragment of it, a balk of curved timber garnished wi some massive bolts, lay on the table, and was evident an object of earnest interest. The diver had turn and was arguing with gestures over it; von Brüni and Grimm were pressing another view. The div shook his head frequently, finally shrugged his shoulde made a salutation, and left the room. Their mov ments had kept me ducking my head pretty frequentl but I now grew almost reckless as to whether I w seen or not. All the weaknesses of my theory crowd on me—the arguments Davies had used at Bensersie Fräulein Dollmann's thoughtless talk; the ease (cor paratively) with which I had reached this spot, not barrier to cross or a lock to force; the publicity of the passage to Memmert by Dollmann, his friend, and Grimm and now this glimpse of business-like routine. In a fe moments I sank from depth to depth of scepticism Where were my mines, torpedoes, and submarine boat and where my imperial conspirators? Was gold aft all at the bottom of this sordid mystery? Dollmar after all a commonplace criminal? The ladder of pro
I had mounted tottered and shook beneath me. "Don be a fool," said the faint voice of reason. "There a your four men. Wait."

Two more employés came into the room in quick ccession and received wages; one looking like a fire- an, the other of a superior type, the skipper of a tug, y. There was another discussion with this latter over e balk of wreck-wood, and this man, too, shrugged his oulders. His departure appeared to end the meeting. rimm shut up a ledger, and I shrank down on my nees, for a general shifting of chairs began. At the me time, from the other side of the building, I heard y knot of men retreating beachwards, spitting and natting as they went. Presently someone walked cross the room towards my window. I sidled away n all fours, rose and flattened myself erect against the all, a sickening despondency on me; my intention slink away south-east as soon as the coast was clear. ut the sound that came next pricked me like an electric nock; it was the tinkle and scrape of curtain-rings.

Quick as thought I was back in my old position, to nd my view barred by a cretonne curtain. It was in ne piece, with no chink for my benefit, but it did not ang straight, bulging towards me under the pressure of mething—human shoulders by the shape. Dollmann, concluded, was still in his old place. I now was ex- sperated to find that I could scarcely hear a word that as said, not even by pressing my ear against the glass. was not that the speakers were of set purpose hushing eir voices—they used an ordinary tone for intimate iscussion—but the glass and curtain deadened the ctual words. Still, I was soon able to distinguish eneral characteristics. Von Brüning's voice—the only ne I had ever heard before—I recognised at once; he as on the left of the table, and Dollmann's I knew om his position. The third was a harsh croak, belonging to the old gentleman whom, for convenience, I shall prematurely begin to call Herr Böhme. It was too old a voice to be Grimm's; besides, it had the ring of authority, and was dealing at the moment in sharp interrogations. Three of its sentences I caught in their entirety. "When was that?" "They went no further?" and "Too long; out of the question." Dollmann's voice, though nearest to me, was the least audible of all. It was a dogged monotone, and what was that odd movement of the curtain at his back? Yes, his hands were behind him clutching and kneading a fold of the cretonne. "You are feeling uncomfortable, my friend," was my comment. Suddenly he threw back his head—I saw the dent of it—and spoke up so that I could not miss a word. "Very well, sir, you shall see them at supper to-night; I will ask them both."

(You will not be surprised to learn that I instantly looked at my watch—though it takes long to write what I have described—but the time was only a quarter to four.) He added something about the fog, and his chair creaked. Ducking promptly I heard the curtain-rings jar, and: "Thick as ever."

"Your report, Herr Dollmann," said Böhme, curtly. Dollmann left the window and moved his chair up to the table; the other two drew in theirs and settled themselves.

"Chatham," said Dollmann, as if announcing a heading. It was an easy word to catch, rapped out sharp, and you can imagine how it startled me. "That's where you've been for the last month!" I said to myself. A map crackled and I knew they were bending over it, while Dollmann explained something. But now my exasperation became acute, for not a syllable more reached me. Squatting back on my heels, I cast about por expedients. Should I steal round and try the door? Too dangerous. Climb to the roof and listen down the stove-pipe? Too noisy, and generally hopeless. I tried for a downward purchase on the upper half of the window, which was of the simple sort in two sections, working vertically. No use; it resisted gentle pressure, would start with a sudden jar if I forced it. I pulled out Davies's knife and worked the point of the blade between sash and frame to give it play—no result; but the knife was a nautical one, with a marling-spike as well as a big blade.

Just now the door within opened and shut again, and I heard steps approaching round the corner to my right. I had the presence of mind not to lose a moment, but moved silently away (blessing the deep Frisian sand) round the corner of the big parallel building. Someone whom I could not see walked past till his boots clattered on tiles, next resounded on boards. "Grimm in his living-room," I inferred. The precious minutes ebbed away—five, ten, fifteen. Had he gone for good? I dared not return otherwise. Eighteen—he was coming out! This time I stole forward boldly when the man had just passed, dimly saw a figure, and clearly enough the glint of a white paper he was holding. He made his circuit and re-entered the room.

Here I felt and conquered a relapse to scepticism. "If this is an important conclave why don't they set guards?" Answer, the only possible one, "Because they stand alone. Their employés, like everyone we had met hitherto, know nothing. The real object of this salvage company (a poor speculation, I opined) is solely to afford a pretext for the conclave." "Why the curtain, even?" "Because there are maps, stupid!"

I was back again at the window, but as impotent as ever against that even stream of low confidential talk. But I would not give up. Fate and the fog had brought me here, the one solitary soul perhaps who by the chain of circumstances had both the will and the opportunity to wrest their secret from these four men.

The marling-spike! Where the lower half of the window met the sill it sank into a shallow groove. I thrust the point of the spike down into the interstice between sash and frame and heaved with a slowly increasing force, which I could regulate to the fraction of an ounce, on this powerful lever. The sash gave, with the faintest possible protest, and by imperceptible degrees I lifted it to the top of the groove, and the least bit above it, say half an inch in all; but it made an appreciable difference to the sounds within, as when you remove your foot from a piano's soft pedal. I could do no more, for there was no further fulcrum for the spike, and I dared not gamble away what I had won by using my hands.

Hope sank again when I placed my cheek on the damp sill, and my ear to the chink. My men were close round the table referring to papers which I heard rustle. Dollmann's "report" was evidently over, and I rarely heard his voice; Grimm's occasionally, von Brüning's and Böhme's frequently; but, as before, it was the latter only that I could ever count on for an intelligible word. For, unfortunately, the villains of the piece plotted without any regard to dramatic fitness or to my interests. Immersed in a subject with which they were all familiar, they were allusive, elliptic, and persistently technical. Many of the words I did catch were unknown to me. The rest were, for the most part, either letters of the lphabet or statistical figures, of depth, distance, and, nce or twice, of time. The letters of the alphabet re-urred often, and seemed, as far as I could make out, o represent the key to the cipher. The numbers cluster-ng round them were mostly very small, with decimals. What maddened me most was the scarcity of plain nouns.

To report what I heard to the reader would be im-ossible; so chaotic was most of it that it left no im-ression on my own memory. All I can do is to tell im what fragments stuck, and what nebulous classifica-ion I involved. The letters ran from A to G, and my est continuous chance came when Böhme, reading apidly from a paper, I think, went through the letters, ackwards, from G, adding remarks to each; thus: G . . . . . completed." "F . . . . . bad . . . . . 1.3 metres ?) . . . . . 2.5 (kilometres ?)." "E . . . . . hirty-two . . . . . 1.2." "D . . . . . 3 weeks . . . . . hirty." "C . . . . . ." and so on.

Another time he went through this list again, only aming each letter himself, and receiving laconic answers rom Grimm—answers which seemed to be numbers, ut I could not be sure. For minutes together I caught othing but the scratching of pens and inarticulate nutterings. But out of the muck-heap I picked five earls—four sibilant nouns and a name that I knew efore. The nouns were "Schlepp-boote" (tugs); Wassertiefe" (depth of water); "Eisenbahn" (rail-ay); "Lotsen" (pilots). The name, also sibilant nd thus easier to hear, was "Esens."

Two or three times I had to stand back and ease my ramped neck, and on each occasion I looked at my atch, for I was listening against time, just as we had owed against time. We were going to be asked to supper, and must be back aboard the yacht in time to receive the invitation. The fog still brooded heavily and the light, always bad, was growing worse. How would they get back? How had they come from Juist? Could we forestall them? Questions of time, tide, distance—just the odious sort of sums I was unfit to cope with—were distracting my attention when it should have been wholly elsewhere. 4.20—4.25—now it was past 4.30 when Davies said the bank would cover. I should have to make for the beacon; but it was fatally near that steamboat path, etc., and I still at intervals heard voices from there. It must have been about 4.35 when there was another shifting of chairs within. Then someone rose, collected papers, and went out; someone else, without rising (therefore Grimm), followed him.

There was silence in the room for a minute, and after that, for the first time, I heard some plain colloquial German, with no accompaniment of scratching or rustling. "I must wait for this," I thought, and waited.

"He insists on coming," said Böhme.

"Ach!" (an ejaculation of surprise and protest from von Brüning).

"I said the 25th."

"Why?"

"The tide serves well. The night-train, of course. Tell Grimm to be ready——" (An inaudible question from von Brüning.) "No, any weather." A laugh from von Brüning and some words I could not catch.

"Only one, with half a load."

"..... meet?"

"At the station."

"So—how's the fog?"

This appeared to be really the end. Both men rose and steps came towards the window. I leapt aside as I heard it thrown up, and covered by the noise backed into safety. Von Brüning called "Grimm!" and that, and the open window, decided me that my line of advance was now too dangerous to retreat by. The only alternative was to make a circuit round the bigger of the two buildings—and an interminable circuit it seemed—and all the while I knew my compass-course "south-east" was growing nugatory. I passed a padlocked door, two corners, and faced the void of fog. Out came the compass, and I steadied myself for the sum. "South-east before—I'm further to the eastward now—east will about do"; and off I went, with an error of four whole points, over tussocks and deep sand. The beach seemed much farther off than I had thought, and I began to get alarmed, puzzled over the compass several times, and finally realised that I had lost my way. I had the sense not to make matters worse by trying to find it again, and, as the lesser of two evils, blew my whistle, softly at first, then louder. The bray of a foghorn sounded right behind me. I whistled again and then ran for my life, the horn sounding at intervals. In three or four minutes I was on the beach and in the dinghy.

CHAPTER XXIII

A CHANGE OF TACTICS

We pushed off without a word, and paddled out of sight of the beach. A voice was approaching, hailing us. "Hail back," whispered Davies; "pretend we're a galliot."

"Ho-a," I shouted, "where am I?"

"Off Memmert," came back. "Where are you bound?"

"Delfzyl," whispered Davies.

"Delf-zyl," I bawled.

A sentence ending with "anchor" was returned.

"The flood's tearing east," whispered Davies; "sit still."

We heard no more, and, after a few minutes drifting "What luck?" said Davies.

"One or two clues, and an invitation to supper."

The clues I left till later; the invitation was the thing, and I explained its urgency.

"How will they get back?" said Davies; "if the fog lasts the steamer's sure to be late."

"We can count for nothing," I answered. "There was some little steamboat off the depôt, and the fog may lift Which is our quickest way?'

"At this tide, a bee-line to Norderney by compass we shall have water over all the banks."

He had all his preparations made, the lamp lit in advance, the compass in position, and we started at once; he at the bow-oar, where he had better contro over the boat's nose; lamp and compass on the floo between us. Twilight thickened into darkness—a chok ing, pasty darkness—and still we sped unfalteringly over that trackless waste, sitting and swinging in our little pool of stifled orange light. To drown fatigue and suspense I conned over my clues, and tried to carve into my memory every fugitive word I had overheard.

"What are there seven of round here?" I called back to Davies once (thinking of A to G). "Sorry," I added, for no answer came.

"I see a star," was my next word, after a long interval. Now it's gone. There it is again! Right aft!"

"That's Borkum light," said Davies, presently; the fog's lifting."

A keen wind from the west struck our faces, and as swiftly as it had come the fog rolled away from us, in one mighty mass, stripping clean and pure the starry dome of heaven, still bright with the western after-glow, and beginning to redden in the east to the rising moon. Norderney light was flashing ahead, and Davies could take his tired eyes from the pool of light.

"Damn!" was all he uttered in the way of gratitude for this mercy, and I felt very much the same; for in a fog Davies in a dinghy was a match for a steamer; in a clear he lost his handicap.

It was a quarter to seven. "An hour'll do it, if we buck up," he pronounced, after taking a rough bearing with the two lights. He pointed out a star to me, which we were to keep exactly astern, and again I applied to their labour my aching back and smarting palms.

"What did you say about seven of something?" said Davies.

"What are there seven of hereabouts?"

"Islands, of course," said Davies. "Is that the clue?"

"Maybe."

Then followed the most singular of all our confabulations. Two memories are better than one, and the sooner I carved the cipher into his memory as well as mine the better record we should have. So, with rigid economy of breath, I snapped out all my story, and answered his breathless questions. It saved me from being mesmerised by the star, and both of us from the unconsciousness of over-fatigue.

"Spying at Chatham, the blackguard?" he hissed.

"What do you make of it?" I asked.

"Nothing about battleships, mines, forts?" he said.

"No."

"Nothing about the Ems, Emden, Wilhelmshaven?"

"No."

"Nothing about transports?"

"No."

"I believe—I was right—after all—something to do—with the channels—behind islands."

And so that outworn creed took a new lease of life; though for my part the words that clashed with it were those that had sunk the deepest.

"Esens," I protested; "that town behind Bensersiel."

"Wassertiefe, Lotsen, Schleppboote," spluttered Davies.

"Kilometre—Eisenbahn," from me, and so on.

I should earn the just execration of the reader if I continued to report such a dialogue. Suffice to say that we realised very soon that the substance of the plot was still a riddle. On the other hand, there was fresh scent, abundance of it; and the question was already taking shape—were we to follow it up or revert to last night's decision and strike with what weapons we had? It was a pressing question, too, the last of many—was there to be no end to the emergencies of this crowded day?—pressing for reasons I could not define, while convinced that we must be ready with an answer by supper-time to-night.

Meantime, we were nearing Norderney; the See-Gat was crossed, and with the last of the flood tide fair beneath us, and the red light on the west pier burning ahead, we began insensibly to relax our efforts. But dared not rest, for I was at that point of exhaustion when mechanical movement was my only hope.

"Light astern," I said, thickly. "Two—white and red."

"Steamer," said Davies; "going south though."

"Three now."

A neat triangle of gems—topaz, ruby, and emerald—hung steady behind us.

"Turned east," said Davies. "Buck up—steamer from Juist. No, by Jove! too small. What is it?"

On we laboured, while the gems waxed in brilliancy as the steamer overhauled us.

"Easy," said Davies, "I seem to know those lights—the Blitz's launch—don't let's be caught rowing like madmen in a muck sweat. Paddle in shore a bit." He was right, and, as in a dream, I saw hurrying and palpitating up the same little pinnace that had towed us out of Bensersiel.

"We're done for now," I remember thinking, for the guilt of the runaway was strong in me; and an old remark of von Brüning's about "police" was in my ears. But she was level with and past us before I could sink ar into despair.

"Three of them behind the hood," said Davies; "what are we to do?"

"Follow," I answered, and essayed a feeble stroke, but the blade scuttered over the surface.

"Let's wait about for a bit," said Davies. "We're ate anyhow. If they go to the yacht they'll think ve're ashore."

"Our shore clothes—lying about."

"Are you up to talking?"

"No; but we must. The least suspicion'll do for us ow."

"Give me your scull, old chap, and put on you coat."

He extinguished the lantern, lit a pipe, and then rowe slowly on, while I sat on a slack heap in the stern an devoted my last resources of will to the emancipatio of the spirit from the tired flesh.

In ten minutes or so we were rounding the pier, an there was the yacht's top-mast against the sky. I sav too, that the launch was alongside of her, and tol Davies so. Then I lit a cigarette, and made a lamentabl effort to whistle. Davies followed suit, and emitted strange melody which I took to be "Home, Sweet Home, but he has not the slightest ear for music.

"Why, they're on board, I believe," said I; "th cabin's lighted. Ahoy there!" I shouted as we cam up. "Who's that?"

"Good evening, sir," said a sailor, who was fendin off the yacht with a boathook. "It's Commander vo Brüning's launch. I think the gentlemen want to se you."

Before we could answer, an exclamation of: "Why here they are!" came from the deck of the Dulcibella and the dim form of von Brüning himself emerged fro the companion-way. There was something of a scuffl down below, which the commander nearly succeeded i drowning by the breeziness of his greeting. Meanwhil the ladder creaked under fresh weight, and Dollman appeared.

"Is that you, Herr Davies?" he said.

"Hullo! Herr Dollmann," said Davies; "how ar you?"

I must explain that we had floated up between th yacht and the launch, whose sailors had passed her ttle aside in order to give us room. Her starboard side-ght was just behind and above us, pouring its green ys obliquely over the deck of the Dulcibella, while we nd the dinghy were in deep shadow between. The most udied calculation could not have secured us more vourable conditions for a moment which I had always eaded—the meeting of Davies and Dollmann. The rmer, having shortened his sculls, just sat where he as, half turned towards the yacht and looking up at s enemy. No lineament of his own face could have en visible to the latter, while those pitiless green rays —you know their ravaging effect on the human physiog-omy—struck full on Dollmann's face. It was my first ir view of it at close quarters, and, secure in my back-round of gloom, I feasted with a luxury of superstitious bhorrence on the livid smiling mask that for a few noments stooped peering down towards Davies. One of ne caprices of the crude light was to obliterate, or at ny rate so penetrate, beard and moustache, as to reveal n outline lips and chin, the features in which defects of haracter are most surely betrayed, especially when your ictim smiles. Accuse me, if you will, of stooping to elodramatic embroidery; object that my own preju-iced fancy contributed to the result; but I can, never-heless, never efface the impression of malignant perfidy nd base passion, exaggerated to caricature, that I eceived in those few instants. Another caprice of the ght was to identify the man with the portrait of him hen younger and clean-shaven, in the frontispiece of is own book; and another still, the most repulsively himsical of all, was to call forth a strong resem-lance to the sweet young girl who had been with us esterday.

Enough! I shall never offend again in this way. In reality I am much more inclined to laugh than shudder over this meeting; for meanwhile the third of our self-invited guests had with stertorous puffing risen to the stage, for all the world like a demon out of a trap-door, specially when he entered the zone of that unearthly light. And there they stood in a row, like delinquents at judgment, while we, the true culprits, had only passively to accept explanations. Of course these were plausible enough. Dollmann having seen the yacht in port that morning had called on his return from Memmert to ask us to supper. Finding no one aboard, and concluding we were ashore, he had meant to leave a note for Davies in the cabin. His friend, Herr Böhme, "the distinguished engineer," was anxious to see over the little vessel that had come so far, and he knew that Davies would not mind the intrusion. Not at all, said Davies; would not they stop and have drinks? No, but would we come to supper at Dollmann's villa? With pleasure, said Davies, but we had to change first. Up to this point we had been masters of the situation, but here von Brüning, who alone of the three appeared to be entirely at his ease, made the retour offensif.

"Where have you been?" he asked.

"Oh, rowing about since the fog cleared," said Davies. I suppose he thought that evasion would pass muster, but as he spoke, I noticed to my horror that a stray beam of light was playing on the bunch of white cotton waste that adorned one of the rowlocks; for we had forgotten to remove these tell-tale appendages. So I added: "After ducks again"; and, lifting one of the guns, let the light flash on its barrel. To my own ear my voice sounded husky and distant.

"Always ducks," laughed von Brüning. "No luck, suppose?"

"No," said Davies; "but it ought to be a good time ifter sunset——"

"What, with a rising tide and the banks covered?"

"We saw some," said Davies, sullenly.

"I tell you what, my zealous young sportsmen, you're ash to leave your boat at anchor here after dark with- ut a light. I came aboard to find your lamp and et it."

"Oh, thanks," said Davies; "we took it with us."

"To see to shoot by?"

We laughed uncomfortably, and Davies compassed a vonderful German phrase to the effect that "it might ome in useful." Happily the matter went no further, or the position was a strained one at the best, and vould not bear lengthening. The launch went along- ide, and the invaders evacuated British soil, looking, or all von Brüning's flippant nonchalance, a rather restfallen party. So much so, that, acute as was my nxiety, I took courage to whisper to Davies, while the ranshipment of Herr Böhme was proceeding: "Ask Dollmann to stay while we dress."

"Why?" he whispered.

"Go on."

"I say, Herr Dollmann," said Davies, "won't you stay n board with us while we dress? There's a lot to tell ou, and—and we can follow on with you when we're eady."

Dollmann had not yet stepped into the launch. "With leasure," he said; but there followed an ominous ilence, broken by von Brüning.

"Oh, come along, Dollmann, and let them alone," he said, brusquely. "You'll be horribly in the way dow there, and we shall never get any supper if you kee them yarning."

"And it's now a quarter-past eight o'clock," grumble Herr Böhme from his corner behind the hood. Dollman submitted, and excused himself, and the launch steame away.

"I think I twig," said Davies, as he helped, almos hoisted, me aboard. "Rather risky though—eh?"

"I knew they'd object—only wanted to make sure."

The cabin was just as we had left it, our shore clothe lying in disorder on the bunks, a locker or two half oper

"Well, I wonder what they did down here," sai Davies.

For my part I went straight to the bookshelf.

"Does anything strike you about this?" I asked kneeling on the sofa.

"Logbook's shifted," said Davies. "I'll swear it wa at the end before."

"That doesn't matter. Anything else?"

"By Jove!—where's Dollmann's book?"

"It's here all right, but not where it should be." had been reading it, you remember, overnight, and i the morning had replaced it in full view among th other books. I now found it behind them, in a wrenche attitude, which showed that someone who had no tim to spare had pushed it roughly inwards.

"What do you make of that?" said Davies.

He produced long drinks, and we allowed ourselves te minutes of absolute rest, stretched at full length on th sofas.

"They don't trust Dollmann," I said. "I spotte that at Memmert even."

"How?"

"First, when they were talking about you and me. He was on his defence, and in a deuce of a funk, too. Böhme was pressing him hard. Again, at the end, when he left the room followed by Grimm, who I'm certain was sent to watch him. It was while he was away that the other two arranged that rendezvous for the night of the 25th. And again just now, when you asked him to stay. I believe it's working out as I thought it would. Von Brüning, and through him Böhme (who is the "engineer from Bremen"), know the story of that short cut and suspect that it was an attempt on your life. Dollmann daren't confess to that, because, morality apart, it could only have been prompted by extreme necessity—that is, by the knowledge that you were really dangerous, and not merely an inquisitive stranger. Now we know his motive; but they don't yet. The position of that book proves it."

"He shoved it in?"

"To prevent them seeing it. There's no earthly reason why they should have hidden it."

"Then we're getting on," said Davies. "That shows they know his real name, or why should he shove the book in? But they don't know he wrote a book, and that I have a copy."

"At any rate he thinks they don't; we can't say more than that."

"And what does he think about me—and you?"

"That's the point. Ten to one he's in tortures of doubt, and would give a fortune to have five minutes' talk alone with you to see how the land lies and get your version of the short cut incident. But they won't let him. They want to watch him in our company and us in his; you see it's an interesting reunion for you and him."

"Well, let's get into these beastly clothes for it," groaned Davies. "I shall have a plunge overboard."

Something drastic was required, and I followed his example, curious as the hour was for bathing.

"I believe I know what happened just now," said I, as we plied rough towels in the warmth below. "They steamed up and found nobody on board. 'I'll leave a note,' says Dollmann. 'No independent communications,' say they (or think they), 'we'll come too, and take the chance of inspecting this hornets' nest.' Down they go, and Dollmann, who knows what to look for first, sees that damning bit of evidence staring him in the face. They look casually at the shelf among other things—examine the logbook, say—and he manages to push his own book out of sight. But he couldn't replace it when the interruption came. The action would have attracted attention then, and Böhme made him leave the cabin in advance, you know."

"This is all very well," said Davies, pausing in his toilet, "but do they guess how we've spent the day? By Jove, Carruthers, that chart with the square cut out; there it is on the rack!"

"We must chance it, and bluff for all we're worth," I said. The fact was that Davies could not be brought to realise that he had done anything very remarkable that day; yet those fourteen sinuous miles traversed blindfold, to say nothing of the return journey and my own exploits, made up an achievement audacious and improbable enough to out-distance suspicion. Nevertheless, von Brüning's banter had been disquieting, and if an inkling of our expedition had crossed his mind or heirs, there were ways of testing us which it would equire all our effrontery to defeat.

"What are you looking for?" said Davies. I was tt the collar and stud stage, but had broken off to tudy the time-table which we had bought that morning.

"Somebody insists on coming by the night train to omewhere, on the 25th," I reminded him. "Böhme, on Brüning, and Grimm are to meet the Somebody."

"Where?"

"At a railway station! I don't know where. They eemed to take it for granted. But it must be somewhere on the sea, because Böhme said, 'the tide serves.'"

"It may be anywhere from Emden to Hamburg." *

"Ho, there's a limit; it's probably somewhere near. Grimm was to come, and he's at Memmert."

"Here's the map. . . . Emden and Norddeich are the only coast stations till you get to Wilhelmshaven—no, to Carolinensiel; but those are a long way east."

"And Emden's a long way south. Say Norddeich then; but according to this there's no train there after 6.15 p.m.; that's hardly 'night.' When's high tide on the 25th?"

"Let's see—8.30 here to-night—Norddeich'll be the same. Somewhere between 10.30 and 11 on the 25th."

"There's a train at Emden at 9.22 from Leer and the south, and one at 10.50 from the north."

"Are you counting on another fog?" said Davies, mockingly.

"No; but I want to know what our plans are."

"Can't we wait till this cursed inspection's over?"

"No, we can't; we should come to grief." This was no barren truism, for I was ready with a plan of my own, though reluctant to broach it to Davies.

* See Map B.

Meanwhile, ready or not, we had to start. The cabi we left as it was, changing nothing and hiding nothing the safest course to take, we thought, in spite of th risk of further search. But, as usual, I transferred m diary to my breast-pocket, and made sure that the tw official letters from England were safe in a compartmen of it.

"What do you propose?" I asked, when we were i the dinghy again.

"It's a case of 'as you were,'" said Davies. "To day's trip was a chance we shall never get again. W must go back to last night's decision—tell them tha we're going to stay on here for a bit. Shooting, I sup pose we shall have to say."

"And courting?" I suggested.

"Well, they know all about that. And then we mus watch for a chance of tackling Dollmann privately. No to-night, because we want time to consider those clue of yours."

"'Consider'?" I said; "that's putting it mildly."

We were at the ladder, and what a languid stiffnes oppressed me I did not know till I touched its freezin rungs, each one of which seared my sore palms like red hot iron.

The overdue steamer was just arriving as we set foo on the quay.

"And yet, by Jove! why not to-night?" pursue Davies, beginning to stride up the pier at a pace I coul not imitate.

"Steady on," I protested; "and, look here, I dis agree altogether. I believe to-day has doubled ou chances. but unless we alter our tactics it has double our risks. We've involved ourselves in too tangled a reb. I don't like this inspection, and I fear that foxy ld Böhme who prompted it. The mere fact of their nviting us shows that we stand badly; for it runs in he teeth of Brüning's warning at Bensersiel, and smells ncommonly like arrest. There's a rift between Dollmann and the others, but it's a ticklish matter to drive ur wedge in; as to to-night, hopeless; they're on the watch, and won't give us a chance. And after all, do we know enough? We don't know why he fled from England and turned German. It may have been an extraditable crime, but it may not. Supposing he defies as? There's the girl, you see—she ties our hands, and f he once gets wind of that, and trades on our weakness, the game's up."

"What are you driving at?"

"We want to detach him from Germany, but he'll probably go to any lengths rather than abandon his position here. His attempt on you is the measure of his interest in it. Now, is to-day to be wasted?" We were passing through the public gardens, and I dropped on to a seat for a moment's rest, crackling dead leaves under me. Davies remained standing, and pecked at the gravel with his toe.

"We have got two valuable clues," I went on; "that rendezvous on the 25th is one, and the name Esens is the other. We may consider them to eternity; I vote we act on them."

"How?" said Davies. "We're under a search-light here; and if we're caught——"

"Your plan—ugh!—it's as risky as mine, and more so," I replied, rising with a jerk, for a spasm of cramp took me. "We must separate," I added, as we walked on. "We want, at one stroke, to prove to them that we're harmless, and to get a fresh start. I go back t London."

"To London!" said Davies. We were passing unde an arc lamp, and, for the dismay his face showed I migh have said Kamchatka.

"Well, after all, it's where I ought to be at this mo ment," I observed.

"Yes, I forgot. And me?"

"You can't get on without me, so you lay up th yacht here—taking your time."

"While you?"

"After making inquiries about Dollmann's past double back as somebody else, and follow up the clues."

"You'll have to be quick," said Davies, abstractedly.

"I can just do it in time for the 25th."

"When you say 'making inquiries,'" he continued looking straight before him, "I hope you don't mea setting other people on his track?"

"He's fair game!" I could not help saying; for ther were moments when I chafed under this scrupulou fidelity to our self-denying ordinance.

"He's our game, or nobody's," said Davies, sharply.

"Oh, I'll keep the secret," I rejoined.

"Let's stick together," he broke out. "I shall mak a muck of it without you. And how are we to com municate—meet?"

"Somehow—that can wait. I know it's a leap in th dark, but there's safety in darkness."

"Carruthers! what are we talking about? If the have the ghost of a notion where we have been to-day you give us away by packing off to London. They' think we know their secret and are clearing out to mak use of it. That means arrest, if you like!"

"Pessimist! Haven't I written proof of good faith in my pocket—official letters of recall, received to-day? It's one deception the less, you see; for those letters may have been opened; skilfully done it's impossible to detect. When in doubt, tell the truth!"

"It's a rum thing how often it pays in this spying business," said Davies, thoughtfully.

We had been tramping through deserted streets under the glare of electricity, I with my leaden shuffle, he with the purposeful forward stoop and swinging arms that always marked his gait ashore.

"Well, what's it to be?" I said. "Here's the Schwannallée."

"I don't like it," said he; "but I trust your judgment."

We turned slowly down, running over a few last points where prior agreement was essential. As we stood at the very gate of the villa: "Don't commit yourself to dates," I said; "say nothing that will prevent you from being here at least a week hence with the yacht still afloat." And my final word, as we waited at the door for the bell to be answered, was: "Don't mind what I say. If things look queer we may have to lighten the ship."

"Lighten?" whispered Davies; "oh, I hope I shan't bosh it."

"I hope I shan't get cramp," I muttered between my teeth.

It will be remembered that Davies had never been to the villa before.

CHAPTER XXIV

FINESSE

THE door of a room on the ground floor was opened to us by a man-servant. As we entered the rattle of a piano stopped, and a hot wave of mingled scent and cigar smoke struck my nostrils. The first thing I noticed over Davies's shoulder, as he preceded me into the room was a woman—the source of the perfume I decided—turning round from the piano as he passed it and staring him up and down with a disdainful familiarity that I at once hotly resented. She was in evening dress pronounced in cut and colour; had a certain exuberant beauty, not wholly ascribable to nature, and a notable lack of breeding. Another glance showed me Dollmann putting down a liqueur glass of brandy, and rising from a low chair with something of a start; and another, von Brüning, lying back in a corner of a sofa, smoking; on the same sofa, vis-à-vis to him, was—yes, of course it was—Clara Dollmann; but how their surroundings altered people, I caught myself thinking. For the rest, I was aware that the room was furnished with ostentation and was stuffy with stove-engendered warmth. Davies steered a straight course for Dollmann, and shook his hand with businesslike resolution. Then he tacked across to the sofa, abandoning me in the face of the enemy.

"Mr. ——?" said Dollmann.

"Carruthers," I answered, distinctly. "I was with Davies in the boat just now, but I don't think he introduced me. And now he has forgotten again," I added dryly, turning towards Davies, who, having presented himself to Fräulein Dollmann, was looking feebly from her to von Brüning, the picture of tongue-tied awkwardness. (The commander nodded to me and stretched himself with a yawn.)

"Von Brüning told me about you," said Dollmann, ignoring my allusion, "but I was not quite sure of the name. No; it was not an occasion for formalities, was it?" He gave a sudden, mirthless laugh. I thought him flushed and excitable; yet, seen in a normal light, he was in some respects a pleasant surprise, the remarkable conformation of the head giving an impression of intellectual power and restless, almost insanely restless, energy.

"What need?" I said. "I have heard so much about you from Davies—and Commander von Brüning—that we seem to be old friends already."

He shot a doubtful look at me, and a diversion came from the piano.

"And now, for Heaven's sake," cried the lady of the perfume, "let us join Herr Böhme at supper!"

"Let me present you to my wife," said Dollmann.

So this was the stepmother; unmistakably German, I am add. I made my bow, and underwent much the same sort of frank scrutiny as Davies, only that it was rather more favourable to me, and ended in a carmine smile.

There was a general movement, and further introductions. Davies was led to the stepmother, and I found myself confronting the daughter with quickened pulses, and a sudden sense of added complexity in the issues. I had, of course, made up my mind to ignore our meeting of yesterday, and had assumed that she would do the same. And she did ignore it—we met as utter strangers;

nor did I venture (for other eyes were upon us) to transmit any sign of intelligence to her. But the next moment I was wondering if I had not fallen into a trap. She had promised not to tell, but under what circumstances? I saw the scene again; the misty flats, the spruce little sail-boat and its sweet young mistress, fresh as a dewy flower, but blanched and demoralised by a horrid fear, appealing to my honour to so act that we three should never meet again, promising to be silent, but as much in her own interest as ours, and under that implied condition which I had only equivocally refused. The condition was violated, not by her fault or ours, but violated. She was free to help her father against us, and was she helping him? What troubled me was the change in her; that she—how can I express it without offence?—was less in discord with her surroundings than she should have been; that in dress, pose and manner (as we exchanged some trivialities) she was too near reflecting the style of the other woman; that, in fact, she in some sort realised my original conception of her, so brutally avowed to Davies, so signally, as I had thought, falsified. In the sick perplexity that this discovery caused me I dare say I looked as foolish as Davies had done, and more so, for the close heat of the room and its tainted atmosphere, succeeding so abruptly to the wholesome nip of the outside air, were giving me a faintness which this moral check lessened my power to combat. Von Brüning's face wore a sneering smile that I winced under; and, turning, I found another pair of eyes fixed on me, those of Herr Böhme, whose squat figure had appeared at a pair of folding doors leading to an adjoining room. Napkin in hand, he was taking in the scene before him with fat benevolence, but exceed-ng shrewdness. I instantly noticed a faint red weal relieving the ivory of his bald head; and I had suffered coo often in the same quarter myself to mistake its origin, namely, our cabin doorway.

"This is the other young explorer, Böhme," said von Brüning. "Herr Davies kidnapped him a month ago, and bullied and starved him into submission; they'll thrown together yet. I believe his sufferings have been terrible."

"His sufferings are over," I retorted. "I've mutinied—deserted—haven't I, Davies?" I caught Davies gazing with solemn gaucherie at Miss Dollmann.

"Oh, what?" he stammered. I explained in English. "Oh, yes, Carruthers has to go home," he said, in his vile lingo.

No one spoke for a moment, and even von Brüning had no persiflage ready.

"Well, are we never going to have supper?" said madame, impatiently; and with that we all moved towards the folding doors. There had been little formality in the proceedings so far, and there was less still in the supper-room. Böhme resumed his repast with appetite, and the rest of us sat down apparently at random, though an underlying method was discernible. As it worked out, Dollmann was at one end of the small table, with Davies on his right and Böhme on his left; Frau Dollmann at the other, with me on her right and von Brüning on her left. The seventh personage, Fräulein Dollmann, was between the commander and Davies on the side opposite to me. No servants appeared, and we waited on ourselves. I have a vague recollection of various excellent dishes, and a distinct one of abundance of wine. Someone filled me a glass of champagne, and

I confess that I drained it with honest avidity, blessing the craftsman who coaxed forth the essence, the fruit that harboured it, the sun that warmed it.

"Why are you going so suddenly?" said von Brüning to me across the table.

"Didn't I tell you we had to call here for letters? I got mine this morning, and among others a summons back to work. Of course I must obey." (I found myself speaking in a frigid silence.) "The annoying thing was that there were two letters, and if I had only come here two days sooner I should have only got the first, which gave me an extension."

"You are very conscientious. How will they know?"

"Ah, but the second's rather urgent."

There was another uncomfortable silence, broken by Dollmann.

"By the way, Herr Davies," he began, "I ought to apologise to you for——"

This was no business of mine, and the less interest I took in it the better; so I turned to Frau Dollmann and abused the fog.

"Have you been in the harbour all day?" she asked; "then how was it you did not visit us? Was Herr Davies so shy?" (Curiosity or malice?)

"Quite the contrary; but I was," I answered coldly; "you see, we knew Herr Dollmann was away, and we really only called here to get my letters; besides, we did not know your address." I looked at Clara and found her talking gaily to von Brüning, deaf seemingly to our little dialogue.

"Anyone would have told you it," said madame, raising her eyebrows.

"I dare say; but directly after breakfast the fog

ame on, and—well, one cannot leave a yacht alone in fog," I said, with professional solidity.

Von Brüning pricked up his ears at this. "I'll be anged if that was your maxim," he laughed; "you're oo fond of the shore!"

I sent him a glance of protest, as though to say: What's the use of your warning if you won't let me act n it?"

For, of course, my excuses were meant chiefly for his consumption, and Fräulein Dollmann's. That the lady addressed them to found them unpalatable was not my ault.

"Then you sat in your wretched little cabin all day?" she persisted.

"All day," I said, brazenly; "it was the safest thing o do." And I looked again at Fräulein Dollmann, frankly and squarely. Our eyes met, and she dropped hers instantly, but not before I had learnt something; for if ever I saw misery under a mask it was on her face. No; she had not told.

I think I puzzled the stepmother, who shrugged her white shoulders, and said in that case she wondered we had dared to leave our precious boat and come to supper. If we knew Frisian fogs as well as she did——

Oh, I explained, we were not so nervous as that: and as for supper on shore, if she only knew what a Spartan life we led——

"Oh, for mercy's sake, don't tell me about it!" she cried, with a grimace; "I hate the mention of yachts. When I think of that dreadful Medusa coming from Hamburg——" I sympathised with half my attention, keeping one strained ear open for developments on my right. Davies, I knew, was in the thick of it, and none too happy under Böhme's eye, but working manfully. "My fault"—"sudden squall"—"quite safe," were some of the phrases I caught; while I was aware, to my alarm, that he was actually drawing a diagram of something with bread-crumbs and table-knives. The subject seemed to gutter out to an awkward end, and suddenly Böhme, who was my right-hand neighbour, turned to me. "You are starting for England to-morrow morning?" he said.

"Yes," I answered; "there is a steamer at 8.15, I believe."

"That is good. We shall be companions."

"Are you going to England, too, sir?" I asked, with hot misgivings.

"No, no! I am going to Bremen: but we shall travel together as far as—you go by Amsterdam, I suppose?—as far as Leer, then. That will be very pleasant." I fancied there was a ghoulish gusto in his tone.

"Very," I assented. "You are making a short stay here, then?"

"As long as usual. I visit the work at Memmert once a month or so, spend a night with my friend Dollmann and his charming family" (he leered round him), "and return."

Whether I was right or wrong in my next step I shall never know, but obeying a strong instinct, "Memmert," I said; "do tell me more about Memmert. We heard a good deal about it from Commander von Brüning; but——"

"He was discreet, I expect," said Böhme.

"He left off at the most interesting part."

"What's that about me?" joined in von Brüning.

"I was saying that we're dying to know more about Memmert, aren't we, Davies?"

"Oh, I don't know," said Davies, evidently aghast at my temerity; but I did not mind that. If he roughed my suit, so much the better; I intended to rough his.

"You gave us plenty of history, commander, but you did not bring up to date." The triple alliance laughed, Dollmann boisterously.

"Well," said von Brüning; "I gave you very good reasons, and you acquiesced."

"And now he is trying to pump me," said Böhme, with his rasping chuckle.

"Wait a bit, sir; I have an excuse. The commander was not only mysterious but inaccurate. I appeal to you, Herr Dollmann, for it was apropos of you. When we fell in with him at Bensersiel, Davies asked him if you were at home, and he said 'No.' When would you be back? Probably soon; but he did not know when."

"Oh, he said that?" said Dollmann.

"Well, only three days later we arrive at Norderney, and find you have returned that very day, but have gone to Memmert. Again (by the way) the mysterious Memmert! But more than ever mysterious now, for in the evening, not only you and Herr Böhme——"

"What penetration!" laughed von Brüning.

"But also Commander von Brüning, pay us a visit in his launch, all coming from Memmert!"

"And you infer?" said von Brüning.

"Why, that you must have known at Bensersiel—only three days ago—exactly when Herr Dollmann was coming back, having an appointment at Memmert with him for to-day."

"Which I wished to conceal from you?"

"Yes, and that's why I'm so inquisitive; it's entirely your own fault."

"So it seems," said he, with mock humility; "but fill your glass and go on, young man. Why should I want to deceive you?"

"That's just what I want to know. Come, confess now; wasn't there something important afoot to-day at Memmert? Something to do with the gold? You were inspecting it, sorting it, weighing it? Or I know! You were transporting it secretly to the mainland?"

"Not a very good day for that! But softly, Herr Carruthers; no fishing for admissions. Who said we had found ny gold?"

"Well, have you? There!"

"That's better! Nothing like candour, my young investigator. But I am afraid, having no authority, I cannot assist you at all. Better try Herr Böhme again. I'm only a casual onlooker."

"With shares."

"Ah! you remember that? (He remembers everything!) With a few shares, then; but with no expert knowledge. Now, Böhme is the consulting engineer. Rescue me, Böhme."

"I cannot disclaim expert knowledge," said Böhme, with humorous gravity; "but I disclaim responsibility. Now, Herr Dollmann is chairman of the company."

"And I," said Dollmann, with a noisy laugh, "must fall back on the shareholders, whose interests I have to guard. One can't be too careful in these confidential matters."

"Here's one who gives his consent," I said. "Can't he represent the rest?"

"Extorted by torture," said von Brüning. "I retract."

"Don't mind them, Herr Carruthers," cried Frau

Dollmann, "they are making fun of you; but I will give you a hint; no woman can keep a secret——"

"Ah!" I cried, triumphantly, "you have been there?"

"I? Not I; I detest the sea! But Clara has." Everyone looked at Clara, who in her turn looked in naïve bewilderment from me to her father.

"Indeed?" I said, more soberly, "but perhaps she is not a free agent."

"Perfectly free!" said Dollmann.

"I have only been there once, some time ago," said she, "and I saw no gold at all."

"Guarded," I observed. "I beg your pardon; I mean that perhaps you only saw what you were allowed to see. And, in any case, the fräulein has no expert knowledge and no responsibility, and, perhaps, no shares. Her province is to be charming, not to hold financial secrets."

"I have done my best to help you," said the stepmother.

"They're all against us, Davies."

"Oh, chuck it, Carruthers!" said Davies, in English.

"He's insatiable," said von Brüning, and there was a pause; clearly, they meant to elicit more.

"Well, I shall draw my own conclusions," I said.

"This is interesting," said von Brüning, "in what sense?"

"It begins to dawn on me that you made fools of us at Bensersiel. Don't you remember, Davies, what an interest he took in all our doings? I wonder if he feared our exploring propensities might possibly lead us to Memmert?"

"Upon my word, this is the blackest ingratitude. I thought I made myself particularly agreeable to you."

"Yes, indeed; especially about the duck shooting How useful your local man would have been—both t us and to you!"

"Go on," said the commander, imperturbably.

"Wait a moment; I'm thinking it out." And thinl ing it out I was in deadly earnest, for all my levity, as pressed my hand on my burning forehead and asked my self where I was to stop in this seductive but perilou fraud. To carry it too far was to court complete ex posure; to stop too soon was equally compromising.

"What is he talking about, and why go on with th ridiculous mystery?" said Frau Dollmann.

"I was thinking about this supper party, and the wa it came about," I pursued, slowly,

"Nothing to complain of, I hope?" said Dollmann.

"Of course not! Impromptu parties are always th pleasantest, and this one was delightfully impromptu Now I bet you I know its origin! Didn't you discu us at Memmert? And didn't one of you suggest——"

"One would almost think you had been there," sa Dollmann.

"You may thank your vile climate that we weren't I retorted, laughing. "But, as I was saying, didn't on of you suggest—which of you? Well, I'm sure it wasn the commander——"

"Why not?" said Böhme.

"It's difficult to explain—an intuition, say—I a sure he stood up for us; and I don't think it was He Dollmann, because he knows Davies already, and he always on the spot; and, in short, I'll swear it was He Böhme, who is leaving early to-morrow, and had nev seen either of us. It was you, sir, who proposed th we should be asked to supper to-night—for inspection?

"Inspection?" said Böhme; "what an extraordinary idea!"

"You can't deny it, though! And one thing more; in the harbour just now—no—this is going too far; I shall mortally offend you." I gave way to hearty laughter.

"Come, let's have it. Your hallucinations are diverting."

"If you insist; but this is rather a delicate matter. You know we were a little surprised to find you all on board; and you, Herr Böhme, did you always take such a deep interest in small yachts? I am afraid that it was at a certain sacrifice of comfort that you inspected ours!" And I glanced at the token he bore of his encounter with our lintel. There was a burst of pent-up merriment, in which Dollmann took the loudest share.

"I warned you, Böhme," he said.

The engineer took the joke in the best possible part. "We owe you apologies," he conceded.

"Don't mention it," said Davies.

"He doesn't mind," I said; "I'm the injured one. I'm sure you never suspected Davies, who could?" (Who indeed? I was on firm ground there.)

"The point is, what did you take me for?"

"Perhaps we take you for it still," said von Brüning.

"Oho! Still suspicious? Don't drive me to extremities."

"What extremities?"

"When I get back to London I shall go to Lloyd's! I haven't forgotten that flaw in the title." There was an impressive silence.

"Gentlemen," said Dollmann, with exaggerated solemnity, "we must come to terms with this formidable young man. What do you say?"

"Take me to Memmert," I exclaimed. "Those are my terms!"

"Take you to Memmert? But I thought you were starting for England to-morrow?"

"I ought to; but I'll stay for that."

"You said it was urgent. Your conscience is very elastic."

"That's my affair. Will you take me to Memmert?"

"What do you say, gentlemen?" Böhme nodded. "I think we owe some reparation. Under promise of absolute secrecy, then?"

"Of course, now that you trust me. But you'll show me everything—honour bright—wreck, depôt, and all?"

"Everything; if you don't object to a diver's dress."

"Victory!" I cried, in triumph. "We've won our point, Davies. And now, gentlemen, I don't mind saying that as far as I am concerned the joke's at an end; and, in spite of your kind offer, I must start for England to-morrow under the good Herr Böhme's wing. And in case my elastic conscience troubles you (for I see you think me a weather-cock) here are the letters received this morning, establishing my identity as a humble but respectable clerk in the British Civil Service, summoned away from his holiday by a tyrannical superior." (I pulled out my letters and tossed them to Dollmann.) "Ah, you don't read English easily, perhaps? I dare say Herr Böhme does."

Leaving Böhme to study dates, post-marks, and contents to his heart's content, and unobserved, I turned to sympathise with my fair neighbour, who complained that her head was going round; and no wonder. But at this juncture, and very much to my surprise, Davies struck in.

"I should like to go to Memmert," he said.

"You?" said von Brüning. "Now I'm surprised at that."

"But you won't be staying here either; Davies," I objected.

"Yes, I shall," said Davies. "Why, I told you I should. If you leave me in the lurch like this I must have time to look round."

"You needn't pretend that you cannot sail alone," said von Brüning.

"It's much more fun with two; I think I shall wire for another friend. Meanwhile, I should like to see Memmert."

"That's only an excuse, I'm afraid," said I.

"I want to shoot ducks too," pursued Davies, reddening. "I always have wanted to; and you promised to help in that, commander."

"You can't get out of it now," I laughed.

"Certainly not," said he, unmoved; "but, honestly, I should advise Herr Davies, if he is ever going to get home this season, to make the best of this fine weather."

"It's too fine," said Davies; "I prefer wind. If I cannot get a friend I think I shall stop cruising, leave the yacht here, and come back for her next year."

There was some mute telegraphy between the allies.

"You can leave her in my charge," said Dollmann, "and start with your friend to-morrow."

"Thanks; but there is no hurry," said Davies, growing redder than ever. "I like Norderney—and we might have another sail in your dinghy, fräulein," he blurted out.

"Thank you," she said, in that low dry voice I had heard yesterday; "but I think I shall not be sailing again—it is getting too cold."

"Oh, no!" said Davies, "it's splendid." But sh had turned to von Brüning, and took no notice.

"Well, send me a report about Memmert, Davies," laughed, with the idea of drawing attention from hi rebuff. But Davies, having once delivered his soul seemed to have lost his shyness, and only gazed at hi neighbour with the placid, dogged expression that knew so well. That was the end of those delicat topics; and conviviality grew apace.

I am not indifferent at any time to good wine an good cheer, nor was it for lack of pressing that I dran as sparingly as I was able, and pretended to a greate elation than I felt. Nor certainly was it from any fin scruples as to the character of the gentleman whos hospitality we were receiving—scruples which I knew affected Davies, who ate little and drank nothing. I any case he was adamant in such matters, and I verily believe would at any time have preferred our own littl paraffin-flavoured messes to the best dinner in the world It was a very wholesome caution that warned me no to abuse the finest brain tonic ever invented by the wi of man. I had finessed Memmert, as one finesses a lo card when holding a higher; but I had too much respec for our adversaries to trade on any fancied security w had won thereby. They had allowed me to win th trick, but I credited them with a better knowledge o my hand than they chose to show. On the other han I hugged the axiom that in all conflicts it is just a fatal to underrate the difficulties of your enemy as t overrate your own. Their chief one—and it multiplie a thousandfold the excitement of the contest—was, felt sure, the fear of striking in error; of using a sledge hammer to break a nut. In breaking it they risked pub city, and publicity, I felt convinced, was death to their ecret. So, even supposing they had detected the finesse, nd guessed that we had in fact got wind of imperial esigns; yet, even so, I counted on immunity so long s they thought we were on the wrong scent, with Mem-nert, and Memmert alone, as the source of our suspicions.

Had it been necessary I was prepared to encourage uch a view, admitting that the cloth von Brüning wore ad made his connection with Memmert curious, and had uggested to Davies, for I should have put it on him, ith his naval enthusiasms, that the wreck-works were eally naval-defence works. If they went further, and uspected that we had tried to go to Memmert that very ay, the position was worse, but not desperate; for the ear that they would take the final step and suppose that e had actually got there and overheard their talk, I atly refused to entertain, until I should find myself nder arrest.

Precisely how near we came to it I shall never rightly now; but I have good reason to believe that we trem-led on the verge. The main issue was fully enough for e, and it was only in passing flashes that I followed the lay of the warring under-currents. And yet, looking ack on the scene, I would warrant there was no party f seven in Europe that evening where a student of uman documents would have found so rich a field, uch noble and ignoble ambitions, such base and holy ears, aye, and such pitiful agonies of the spirit. Roughly ivided though we were into separate camps, no two of s were wholly at one. Each wore a mask in the grand nposture; excepting, I am inclined to think, the lady n my left, who, outside her own well-being, which she ultivated without reserve, had, as far as I could see, but one axe to grind—the intimacy of von Brüning and her stepdaughter—and ground it openly.

Not even Böhme and von Brüning were wholly at one; and as moral distances are reckoned, Davies and I were leagues apart. Sitting between Dollmann and Dollmann's daughter, the living and breathing symbols of the two polar passions he had sworn to harmonise, he kept an equilibrium which, though his aims were nominally mine, I could not attain to. For me the man was the central figure; if I had attention to spare it was on him that I bestowed it; groping disgustfully after his hidden springs of action, noting the evidences of great gifts squandered and prostituted; questioning where he was most vulnerable; whom he feared most, us or his colleagues; whether he was open to remorse or shame; or whether he meditated further crime. The girl was incidental. After the first shock of surprise I had soon enough discovered that she, like the rest, had assumed a disguise; for she was far too innocent to sustain the deception; and yesterday was fresh in my memory. I was forced to continue turning her assumed character to account; but it would be pharisaical in me to say that I rose to any moral heights in her regard—wine and excitement had deadened my better nature to that extent. I thought she looked prettier than ever, and, as time passed, I fell into a cynical carelessness about her. This glimpse of her home life, and the desperate expedients to which she was driven (whether by compulsion or from her own regard for Davies) to repel and dismiss him, did not strike me as they might have done as the crowning argument in favour of the course we had adopted the night before, that of compassing our end without noise and scandal, disarming Dollmann, but aiding him to escape from the allies he had betrayed. To Davies, the man, if not a pure abstraction, was at most a noxious vermin to be trampled on for the public good; while the girl, in her blackguardly surroundings, and with her sinister future, had become the very source of his impulse.

And the other players? Böhme was my abstraction, the fortress whose foundations we were sapping, the embodiment of that systematised force which is congenital to the German people. In von Brüning, the personal factor was uppermost. Callous as I was this evening, I could not help wondering occasionally, as he talked and laughed with Clara Dollmann, what in his innermost thoughts, knowing her father, he felt and meant. It is a point I cannot and would not pursue, and, thank Heaven, it does not matter now; yet, with fuller knowledge of the facts, and, I trust, a mellower judgment, I often return to the same debate, and, by I know not what illogical bypaths, always arrive at the same conclusion, that I liked the man and like him still.

We behaved as sportsmen in the matter of time, giving them over two hours to make up their minds about us. It was only when tobacco smoke and heat brought back my faintness, and a twinge of cramp warned me that human strength has limits, that I rose and said we must go; that I had to make an early start to-morrow. I am hazy about the farewells, but I think that Dollmann was the most cordial, to me at any rate, and I augured good therefrom. Böhme said he should see me again. Von Brüning, though bound for the harbour also, considered it was far too early to be going yet, and said good-bye.

"You want to talk us over," I remember saying with the last flicker of gaiety I could muster.

We were in the streets again, under a silver, breathless night; dizzily footing the greasy ladder again; in the cabin again, where I collapsed on a sofa just as was, and slept such a deep and stringent sleep that the men of the Blitz's launch might have handcuffed and trussed and carried me away, without incommoding me in the least.

CHAPTER XXV

I DOUBLE BACK

"GOOD-BYE, old chap," called Davies.

"Good-bye." The whistle blew and the ferry steamer forged ahead, leaving Davies on the quay bareheaded and wearing his old Norfolk jacket and stained grey flannels, as at our first meeting in Flensburg station. There was no bandaged hand this time but he looked pinched and depressed; his eyes had black circles round them; and again I felt that same indefinable pathos in him.

"Your friend is in low spirits," said Böhme, who was installed on a seat beside me, voluminously caped and rugged against the biting air. It was a still, sunless day.

"So am I," I grunted, and it was the literal truth. I was only half awake, felt unwashed and dissipated, heavy in head and limbs. But for Davies I should never have been where I was. It was he who had patiently coaxed me out of my bunk, packed my bag, fed me with tea and an omelette (to which I believe he had devoted peculiarly tender care), and generally mothered me for departure. While I swallowed my econd cup he was brushing the mould and smoothing he dents from my felt hat, which had been entombed or a month in the sail-locker; working at it with a emorseful concern in his face. The only initiative I m conscious of having shown was in the matter of my ag. "Put in my sea clothes, oils, and all," I had said; I may want them again." There was mortal need f a thorough consultation, but this was out of the uestion. Davies did not badger or complain, but only imidly asked me how we were to meet and communiate, a question on which my mind was an absolute lank.

"Look out for me about the 26th," I suggested eebly.

Before we left the cabin he gave me a scrap of penilled paper and saw that it went safely into my pocketook. "Look at it in the train," he said.

Unable to cope with Böhme, I paced the deck aimessly as we swung round the See-Gat into the Buse ief, trying to identify the point where we crossed it esterday blindfold. But the tide was full, and the aters blank for miles round till they merged in haze. oon I drifted down into the saloon, and crouching over stove pulled out that scrap of paper. In a crabbed, oyish hand, and much besmudged with tobacco ashes, found the following notes:—

"(1) *Your journey. Norddeich 8.58, Emden 10.32, eer 11.16 (Böhme changes for Bremen), Rheine 1.8 change), Amsterdam 7.17 p.m. Leave again via Hook .52, London 9 a.m.

"(2) The coast-station—their rondezvous—querry is Norden? (You pass it 9.13)—there is a tidal creek up to it. High-water there on 25th, say 10.30 to 11 p.m. It cannot be Norddeich, which I find has a dredged-out low-water channel for the steamer, so 'tide serves' would not apply.

* See Maps A and B.

"(3) Your other clews (tugs, pilots, depths, railway Esens, seven of something). Querry: Scheme of defence by land and sea for North Sea Coast?

"Sea—7 islands, 7 channels between (counting Wes Ems), very small depths (what you said) in most o them. Tugs and pilots for patrol work behind islands as I always said. Querry: Rondezvous is for inspecting channels?

"Land—Look at railway (map in ulster pocket running in a loop all round Friesland, a few miles from coast. Querry: To be used as line of communicatio for army corps. Troops could be quickly sent to any threatened point. Esens the base? It is in top centre of loop. Von Brooning dished us fairly over that a Bensersiel.

"Chatham—D. was spying after our naval plans fo war with Germany.

"Von Brooning runs naval part over here.

"Where does Burmer come in? Querry—you go t Bremen and find out about him?"

I nodded stupidly over this document—so stupidly that I found myself wondering whether Burmer was place or a person. Then I dozed, to wake with a violen start and find the paper on the floor. Panic-stricken I hid it away, and went on deck, when I found we wer close to Norddeich, running up to the bleakest of blea jetties thrown out from the dyke-bound polders of th mainland. Böhme and I landed together, and he wa at my elbow as I asked for a ticket for Amsterdam, an was given one as far as Rheine, a junction near the Dutch frontier. He was ensconced in an opposite corner to me in the railway carriage, looking like an Indian idol. "Where do you come in?" I pondered, dreamily. Too sleepy to talk, I could only blink at him, sitting bolt upright with my arms folded over my precious pocket-book. Finally, I gave up the struggle, buttoned my ulster tightly up, and turning my back upon him with an apology, lay down to sleep, the precious pocket nethermost. He was at liberty to rifle my bag if he chose, and I dare say he did. I cannot say, for from this point till Rheine, for the best part of four hours, that is, I had only two lucid intervals.

The first was at Emden, where we both had to change. Here, as we pushed our way down the crowded platform, Böhme, after being greeted respectfully by several persons, was at last button-holed without means of escape by an obsequious gentleman, whose description is of no moment, but whose conversation is. It was about a canal; what canal I did not gather, though, from a name dropped, I afterwards identified it as one in course of construction as a feeder to the Ems. The point is that the subject was canals. At the moment it was seed dropped in unreceptive soil, but it germinated later. I passed on, mingling with the crowd, and was soon asleep again in another carriage where Böhme this time did not follow me.

The second occasion was at Leer, where I heard myself called by name, and woke to find him at the window. He had to change trains, and had come to say good-bye. "Don't forget to go to Lloyd's," he grated in my ear. I expect it was a wan smile that I returned, for I was at a very low ebb, and my fortress looked sarcastically impregnable. But the sapper wa free; "free" was my last conscious thought.

Even after Rheine, where I changed for the last tim a brutish drowsiness enchained me, and the afternoo was well advanced before my faculties began to revive

The train crept like a snail from station to statio
I might, so a fellow-passenger told me, have waite three hours at Rheine for an express which would hav brought me to Amsterdam at about the same time or, if I had chosen to break the journey further bac two hours at either Emden or Leer would still hav enabled me to catch the said express at Rheine. The alternatives had escaped Davies, and, I surmised, ha been suppressed by Böhme, who doubtless did not wa me behind him, free either to double back or to follo him to Bremen.

The pace, then, was execrable, and there were delays we were behind time at Hengelo, thirty minutes late Apeldoorn; so that I might well have grown nervou about my connections at Amsterdam, which were some jeopardy. But as I battled out of my letharg and began to take account of our position and prospect quite a different thought at the outset affected m Anxiety to reach London was swamped in reluctance quit Germany, so that I found myself grudging eve mile that I placed between me and the frontier. It w the old question of urgency. To-day was the 23r
The visit to London meant a minimum absence forty-eight hours, counting from Amsterdam; that to say, that by travelling for two nights and one da and devoting the other day to investigating Dollmann past, it was humanly possible for me to be back on th Frisian coast on the evening of the 25th. Yes, I cou

e at Norden, if that was the "rondezvous," at 7 p.m. ut what a scramble! No margin for delays, no phy- cal respite. Some pasts take a deal of raking up— her persons may be affected; men are cautious, they ip you up with red tape; or the man who knows is it at lunch—a protracted lunch; or in the country— protracted week-end. Will you see Mr. So-and-so, leave a note? Oh! I know those public departments -from the inside! And the Admiralty! . . . I saw yself baffled and racing back the same night to Ger- any, with two days wasted, arriving, good for nothing, Norden, with no leisure to reconnoitre my ground; be baffled again there, probably, for you cannot ways count on fogs (as Davies said). Esens was an- her clue, and "to follow Burmer"—there was some- ing in that notion. But I wanted time, and had I me? How long could Davies maintain himself at orderney? Not so very long, from what I remem- ered of last night. And was he even safe there? feverish dream recurred to me—a dream of Davies a diving-dress; of a regrettable hitch in the air- pply— Stop, that was nonsense! . . . Let us be ne. What matter if he had to go? What matter if took my time in London? Then with a flood of shame saw Davies's wistful face on the quay, heard his grim aculation: "He's our game or no one's;" and my own llen "Oh, I'll keep the secret!" London was utterly possible. If I found my informant, what credentials d I, what claim to confidences? None, unless I told e whole story. Why, my mere presence in Whitehall ould imperil the secret; for, once on my native heath, should be recognised—possibly haled to judgment; at e best should escape in a cloud of rumour—"last heard of at Norderney" ; "only this morning was raising Cai at the Admiralty about a mythical lieutenant." No Back to Friesland, was the word. One night's rest— must have that—between sheets, on a feather bed ; on long, luxurious night, and then back refreshed to Fries land, to finish our work in our own way, and with non but our own weapons.

Having reached this resolve, I was nearly putting into instant execution, by alighting at Amersfoort, bu thought better of it. I had a transformation to effec before I returned North, and the more populous centre made it in the less it was likely to attract notice. Be sides, I had in my mind's eye a perfect bed in a perfec hostelry hard by the Amstel River. It was an econom in the end.

So, at half-past eight I was sipping my coffee in th aforesaid hostelry, with a London newspaper befor me, which was unusually interesting, and some Germa journals, which, "in hate of a wrong not theirs," wer one and all seething with rancorous Anglophobia. A nine I was in the Jewish quarter, striking bargains i an infamous marine slop-shop. At half-past nine I wa despatching this unscrupulous telegram to my chief— "Very sorry, could not call Norderney ; hope extensio all right ; please write to Hôtel du Louvre, Paris. At ten I was in the perfect bed, rapturously flinging m limbs abroad in its glorious redundancies. And at 8.2 on the following morning, with a novel chilliness abou the upper lip, and a vast excess of strength and spirit I was sitting in a third-class carriage, bound for Ge many, and dressed as a young seaman, in a pea-jacke peaked cap, and comforter.

The transition had not been difficult. I had shave ff my moustache and breakfasted hastily in my bed-oom, ready equipped for a journey in my ulster and oth cap. I had dismissed the hotel porter at the ation, and left my bag at the cloak-room, after taking ut of it an umber bundle and substituting the ulster. he umber bundle, which consisted of my oilskins, and ithin them my sea-boots and a few other garments nd necessaries, the whole tied up with a length of tarry ope, was now in the rack above me, and (with a stout ick) represented my luggage. Every article in it—I udder at their origin—was in strict keeping with my umble métier, for I knew they were liable to search at he frontier custom-house; but there was a Baedeker f Northern Germany in my jacket pocket.

For the nonce, if questions were asked, I was an nglish seaman, going to Emden to join a ship, with a icket as far as the frontier. Beyond that a definite cheme of action had still to be thought out. One thing, owever, was sure. I was determined to be at Norden o-morrow night, the 25th. A word about Norden, hich is a small town seven miles south of Norddeich. hen hurriedly scanning the map for coast stations in he cabin yesterday, I had not thought of Norden, ecause it did not appear to be on the coast, but Davies ad noticed it while I slept, and I now saw that his encilled hint was a shrewd one. The creek he spoke f, though barely visible on the map,* flowed into the ms Estuary in a south-westerly direction. The "night ain" tallied to perfection, for high tide in the creek ould be, as Davies estimated, between 10.30 and 11 .m. on the night of the 25th; and the time-table owed that the only night train arriving at Norden was one from the south at 10.46 p.m. This looke promising. Emden, which I had inclined to on th spur of the moment, was out of court in comparison, fo many reasons; not the least being that it was serve by three trains between 9 p.m. and 1 a.m., so that th phrase "night train" would be ambiguous and no decisive as with Norden.

* See Map B.

So far good; but how was I to spend the intervenin time? Should I act on Davies's "querry" and go t Bremen after Böhme? I soon dismissed that idea. I was one to act upon if others failed; for the present i meant another scramble. Bremen is six hours fro Norden by rail. I should spend a disproportionat amount of my limited time in trains, and I should wan a different disguise. Besides, I had already learnt some thing fresh about Böhme; for the seed dropped at Emde Station yesterday had come to life. A submarine en gineer I knew him to be before; I now knew that canal were another branch of his labours—not a very illumin ating fact; but could I pick up more in a single day?

There remained Esens, and it was thither I resolve to go to-night—a tedious journey, lasting till past eigh in the evening; but there I should only be an hou from Norden by rail.

And at Esens?

All day long I strove for light on the central mystery collecting from my diary, my memory, my imaginatio from the map, the time-table, and Davies's grubb jottings, every elusive atom of material. Sometimes issued from a reverie with a start, to find a phlegmati Dutch peasant staring strangely at me over his chin pipe. I was more careful over the German borde Davies's paper I soon knew by heart. I pictured hi writing it with his cramped fist in his corner by the stove, fighting against sleep, absently striking salvos of matches, while I snored in my bunk; absently diverging into dreams, I knew, of a rose-brown face under dewy hair and a grey Tam-o'-shanter; though not a word of her came into the document. I smiled to see his undying faith in the "channel theory" reconciled at the eleventh hour, with new data touching the neglected "land."

The result was certainly interesting, but it left me cold. That there existed in the German archives some such scheme of defence for the North Sea coast was very likely indeed. The seven islands, with their seven shallow channels (though, by the way, two of them, the twin branches of the Ems, are by no means so shallow), were a very fair conjecture, and fitted in admirably with the channel theory, whose intrinsic merits I had always recognised; my constant objection having been that it did not go nearly far enough to account for our treatment. The ring of railway round the peninsula, with Esens at the apex, was suggestive, too; but the same objection applied. Every country with a maritime frontier has, I suppose, secret plans of mobilisation for its defence, but they are not such as could be discovered by passing travellers, not such as would warrant stealthy searches, or require for their elaboration so recondite a meeting-place as Memmert. Dollmann was another weak point; Dollmann in England, spying. All countries, Germany included, have spies in their service, dirty though necessary tools; but Dollmann in such intimate association with the principal plotters on this side; Dollmann rich, influential, a power in local affairs —it was clear he was no ordinary spy.

And here I detected a hesitation in Davies's roug sketch, a reluctance, as it were, to pursue a clue to it logical end. He spoke of a German scheme of coas defence, and in the next breath of Dollmann spyin for English plans in the event of war with Germany and there he left the matter; but what sort of plans Obviously (if he was on the right track) plans of attac on the German coast as opposed to those of strateg on the high seas. But what sort of an attack? Ob viously again, if his railway-ring meant anything, a attack by invasion on that remote and desolate littora which he had so often himself declared to be impreg nably secure behind its web of sands and shallows. M mind went back to my question at Bensersiel, "Can thi coast be invaded?" to his denial and our fruitless surve of the dykes and polders. Was he now reverting to fancy we had both rejected, while shrinking from givin it explicit utterance? The doubt was tantalising.

A brief digression here about the phases of my journey At Rheine I changed trains, turned due north and becam a German seaman. There was little risk in a defectiv accent—sailors are so polyglot; while an English sailo straying about Esens might excite curiosity. Yesterda I had paid no heed to the landscape; to-day I neglecte nothing that could conceivably supply a hint.

From Rheine to Emden we descended the valley o the Ems; at first through a land of thriving towns an fat pastures, degenerating further north to spaces o heathery bog and moorland—a sad country, but lookin at its best, such as that was, for I should mention her that the weather, which in the early morning had bee as cold and misty as ever, grew steadily milder an brighter as the day advanced; while my newspape stated that the glass was falling and the anticyclone giving way to pressure from the Atlantic.

At Emden, where we entered Friesland proper, the train crossed a big canal, and for the twentieth time that day (for we had passed numbers of them in Holland, and not a few in Germany), I said to myself, "Canals, canals. Where does Böhme come in?" It was dusk, but light enough to see an unfamiliar craft, a torpedo-boat in fact, moored to stakes at one side. In a moment I remembered that page in the "North Sea Pilot" where the Ems-Jade Canal is referred to as deep enough to carry gun-boats, and as used for that strategic purpose between Wilhelmshaven and Emden, along the base, that is, of the Frisian peninsula. I asked a peasant opposite; yes, that was the Ems-Jade Canal. Had Davies forgotten it? It would have greatly strengthened his halting sketch.

At the bookstall at Emden I bought a pocket ordnance map * of Friesland, on a much larger scale than anything I had used before, and when I was unobserved studied the course of the canal, with an impatience which, alas! quickly cooled. From Emden northwards I used the same map to aid my eyesight, and with its help saw in the gathering gloom more heaths and bogs once a great glimmering lake, and at intervals cultivated tracts; a watery land as ever; pools, streams and countless drains and ditches. Extensive woods were marked also, but further inland. We passed Norden at seven, just dark. I looked out for the creek, and, sure enough, we crossed it just before entering the station. Its bed was nearly dry, and I distinguished barges lying aground in it. This being the junction for Esens, I had to wait three-quarter of an hour, and then turned east through the uttermos northern wilds, stopping at occasional village station and keeping five or six miles from the sea. It wa during this stage, in a wretchedly lit compartment, an alone for the most part, that I finally assembled a my threads and tried to weave them into a cable whos core should be Esens: "a town," so Baedeker said "of 3,500 inhabitants, the centre of a rich agricultura district. Fine spire."

* There is, of course, no space to reproduce this, but here and henceforward the reader is referred to Map B.

Esens is four miles inland from Bensersiel. I re viewed every circumstance of that day at Bensersie and boiled to think how von Brüning had tricked me He had driven to Esens himself, and read me so we that he actually offered to take me with him, and I ha refused from excess of cleverness. Stay, though; if had happened to accept he would have taken very goo care that I saw nothing important. The secret, there fore, was not writ large on the walls of Esens. Was i connected with Bensersiel too, or the country between I searched the ordnance map again, standing up to ge a better light and less jolting. There was the roa northward from Esens to Bensersiel, passing throug dots and chess-board squares, the former meaning fen the latter fields, so the reference said. Something else too, immediately caught my eye, and that was a strea running to Bensersiel. I knew it at once for the mudd stream or drain we had seen at the harbour, issuin through the sluice or siel from which Bensersiel took it name. But it arrested my attention now because i looked more prominent than I should have expected Charts are apt to ignore the geography of the mainland except in so far as it offers sea-marks to mariners. O

the chart this stream had been shown as a rough little corkscrew, like a sucking-pig's tail. On the ordnance map it was marked with a dark blue line, was labelled "Benser Tief," and was given a more resolute course; bends became angles, and there were what appeared to be artificial straightnesses at certain points. One of the threads in my skein, the canal thread, tingled sympathetically, like a wire charged with current. Standing astraddle on both seats, with the map close to the lamp, I greedily followed the course of the "tief" southward. It inclined away from the road to Esens and passed the town about a mile to the west, diving underneath the railway. Soon after it took angular tacks to the eastward, and joined another blue line trending south-east, and lettered "Esens—Wittmunde Canal." This canal, however, came to an abrupt end half-way to Wittmund, a neighbouring town.

For the first time that day there came to me a sense of genuine inspiration. Those shallow depths and short distances, fractions of metres and kilometres, which I had overheard from Böhme's lips at Memmert, and which Davies had attributed to the outside channels—did they refer to a canal? I remembered seeing barges in Bensersiel harbour. I remembered conversations with the natives in the inn, scraps of the post-master's pompous loquacity, talks of growing trade, of bricks and grain passing from the interior to the islands; from another source—was it the grocer of Wangeroog?—of expansion of business in the islands themselves as bathing resorts; from another source again—von Brüning himself, surely—of Dollmann's personal activity in the development of the islands. In obscure connection with these things, I saw the torpedo-boat in the Ems-Jade Canal.

It was between Dornum and Esens that these idea came, and I was still absorbed in them when the trai drew up, just upon nine o'clock, at my destination, an after ten minutes' walk, along with a handful of othe passengers, I found myself in the quiet cobbled street of Esens, with the great church steeple, that we had s often seen from the sea, soaring above me in the moon light.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE SEVEN SIELS

SELECTING the very humblest Gasthaus I could discover I laid down my bundle and called for beer, bread, an Wurst. The landlord, as I had expected, spoke th Frisian dialect, so that though he was rather difficul to understand, he had no doubts about the purity of m own German high accent. He was a worthy fellow, an hospitably interested: "Did I want a bed?" "No I was going on to Bensersiel," I said, "to sleep there and take the morning Postschiff to Langeoog Island. (I had not forgotten our friends the twin giants an their functions.) "I was not an islander myself?" h asked. "No, but I had a married sister there; ha just returned from a year's voyaging, and was going t visit her." "By the way," I asked, "how are the getting on with the Benser Tief?" My friend shrugge his shoulders; it was finished, he believed. "And th connection to Wittmund?" "Under constructio still." "Langeoog would be going ahead then? "Oh! he supposed so, but he did not believe in thes new-fangled schemes." "But it was good for trade, supposed? Esens would benefit in sending goods b he ' tief '—what was the traffic, by the way ? " " Oh, . few more barge-loads than before of bricks, timber, coals, tc., but it would come to nothing he knew ; Aktien-esellsehäfte (companies) were an invention of the devil. A few speculators got them up and made money them-elves out of land and contracts, while the shareholders hey had hoodwinked starved." " There's something n that," I conceded to this bigoted old conservative ; " my sister at Langeoog rents her lodging-house from a man named Dollmann ; they say he owns a heap of and about. I saw his yacht once—pink velvet and electric light inside, they say——"

" That's the name," said mine host, " that's one of hem—some sort of foreigner, I've heard ; runs a sal-vage concern, too, Juist way."

" Well, he won't get any of my savings ! " I laughed, nd soon after took my leave, and inquired from a passer-by the road to Dornum. " Follow the railway," I was told.

With a warm wind in my face from the south-west, leecy clouds and a half-moon overhead, I set out, not for Bensersiel but for Benser Tief, which I knew must cross the road to Dornum somewhere. A mile or so of cobbled causeway flanked with ditches and willows, and running cheek by jowl with the railway track ; then a bridge, and below me the " Tief " ; which was, in fact, a small canal. A rutty track left the road, and sloped down to it one side ; a rough siding left the railway, nd sloped down to it on the other.

I lit a pipe and sat on the parapet for a little. No one was stirring, so with great circumspection I began o reconnoitre the left bank to the north. The siding entered a fenced enclosure by a locked gate—a gate could have easily climbed, but I judged it wiser to go round by the bridge again and look across. The enclosure was a small coal-store, nothing more; there were gaunt heaps of coal glittering in the moonlight; a barge half loaded lying alongside, and a deserted office building. I skulked along a sandy towpath in solitude. Fens and field were round me, as the map had said; willows and osier-beds; the dim forms of cattle; the low melody of wind roaming unfettered over a plain; once or twice the flutter and quack of a startled wild-duck.

Presently I came to a farmhouse, dark and silent; opposite it, in the canal, a couple of empty barges. I climbed into one of these, and sounded with my stick on the off-side—barely three feet; and the torpedo-boat melted out of my speculations. The stream, I observed also, was only just wide enough for two barges to pass with comfort. Other farms I saw, or thought I saw, and a few more barges lying in side-cuts linked by culverts to the canal, but nothing noteworthy; and mindful that I had to explore the Wittmund side of the railway too, I turned back, already a trifle damped in spirits, but still keenly expectant.

Passing under the road and railway, I again followed the tow-path, which, after half a mile, plunged into woods, then entered a clearing and another fenced enclosure; a timber-yard by the look of it. This time I stripped from the waist downwards, waded over, dressed again, and climbed the paling. (There was a cottage standing back, but its occupants evidently slept.) I was in a timber-yard, by the stacks of wood and the steam saw-mill; but something more than a timber-yard, for as I warily advanced under the shadow of the trees at the edge of the clearing I came to a long tin shed which strangely reminded me of Memmert, and below it, nearer the canal, loomed a dark skeleton framework, which proved to be a half-built vessel on stocks. Close by was a similar object, only nearly completed—a barge. A paved slipway led to the water there, and the canal broadened to a siding or back-water in which lay seven or eight more barges in tiers. I scaled another paling and went on, walking, I should think, three miles by the side of the canal, till the question of bed and ulterior plans brought me to a halt. It was past midnight, and I was adding little to my information. I had encountered a brickfield, but soon after that there was increasing proof that the canal was as yet little used for traffic. It grew narrower, and there were many signs of recent labour for its improvement. In one place a dammed-off deviation was being excavated, evidently to abridge an impossible bend. The path had become atrocious, and my boots were heavy with clay. Bearing in mind the abruptly-ending blue line on the map, I considered it useless to go farther, and retraced my steps, trying to concoct a story which would satisfy an irritable Esens inn-keeper that it was a respectable wayfarer, and not a tramp or a lunatic, who knocked him up at half-past one or thereabouts.

But a much more practical resource occurred to me as I approached the timber-yard; for lodging, free and accessible, lay there ready to hand. I boarded one of the empty barges in the backwater, and surveyed my quarters for the night. It was of a similar pattern to all the others I had seen; a lighter, strictly, in the sense that it had no means of self-propulsion, and no separate quarters for a crew, the whole interior of the hull being free for cargo. At both bow and stern there were ten feet or so of deck, garnished with bitts and bollards. The rest was an open well, flanked by waterways of substantial breadth; the whole of stout construction and, for a humble lighter, of well-proportioned and even graceful design, with a marked forward sheer, and, as I had observed in the specimen on the stocks, easy lines at the stern. In short, it was apparent, even to an ignorant landsman like myself, that she was designed not merely for canal work but for rough water; and well she might be, for, though the few miles of sea she had to cross in order to reach the islands were both shallow and sheltered, I knew from experience what a vicious surf they could be whipped into by a sudden gale. It must not be supposed that I dwelt on this matter. On limited lines I was making progress, but the wings of imagination still drooped nervelessly at my sides. Otherwise I perhaps should have examined this lighter more particularly, instead of regarding it mainly as a convenient hiding-place. Under the stern-deck was stored a massive roll of tarpaulin, a corner of which made an excellent blanket, and my bundle a good pillow. It was a descent from the luxury of last night; but a spy, I reflected, philosophically, cannot expect a feather bed two nights running, and this one was at any rate airier and roomier than the coffin-like bunk of the Dulcibella, and not so very much harder.

When snugly ensconced, I studied the map by intermittent match-light. It had been dawning on me in the last half-hour that this canal was only one of several; that in concentrating myself on Esens and Bensersiel, I had forgotten that there were other villages ending in siel, also furnished on the chart with corkscrew streams; and, moreover, that Böhme's statistics of depth and distance had been marshalled in seven categories, A to G. The very first match brought full recollection as to the villages. The suffix siel repeated itself all round the coast-line. Five miles eastward of Bensersiel was Neu-harlingersiel, and further on Carolinensiel. Four miles westward was Dornumersiel; and further on Nessmersiel and Hilgenriedersiel. That was six on the north coast of the peninsula alone. On the west coast, facing the Ems, there was only one, Greetsiel, a good way south of Norden. But on the east, facing the Jade, there were no less than eight, at very close intervals. A moment's thought and I disregarded this latter group; they had nothing to do with Esens, nor had they any imaginable raison d'être as veins for commerce; differing markedly in this respect from the group of six on the north coast, whose outlook was the chain of islands, and whose inland centre, almost exactly, was Esens. I still wanted one to make seven, and as a working hypothesis added the solitary Greetsiel. At all seven villages streams debouched, as at Bensersiel. From all seven points of issue dotted lines were marked seaward, intersecting the great tidal sands and leading towards the islands. And on the mainland behind the whole sevenfold system ran the loop of railway. But there were manifold minor points of difference. No stream boasted so deep and decisive a blue lintel as did Benser Tief; none penetrated so far into the Hinterland. They varied in length and sinuosity. Two, those belonging to Hilgenriedersiel and Greetsiel, appeared not to reach the railway at all. On the other hand, Carolinensiel, opposite Wangeroog Island, had a branch line all to itself.

Match after match waxed and waned as I puzzled over the mystic seven. In the end I puzzled myself to sleep, with the one fixed idea that to-morrow, on my way back to Norden, I must see more of these budding canals, if such they were. My dreams that night were of a mighty chain of redoubts and masked batteries couching perdus among the sand-dunes of desolate islets; built, coral-like, by infinitely slow and secret labour; fed by lethal cargoes borne in lighters and in charge of stealthy mutes who, one and all, bore the likeness of Grimm. I was up and away at daylight (the weather mild and showery), meeting some navvies on my way back to the road, who gave me good morning and a stare. On the bridge I halted and fell into torments of indecision. There was so much to do and so little time to do it in. The whole problem seemed to have been multiplied by seven, and the total again doubled and redoubled—seven blue lines on land, seven dotted lines on the sea, seven islands in the offing. Once I was near deciding to put my pretext into practice, and cross to Langeoog; but that meant missing the rendezvous, and I was loth to do that.

At any rate, I wanted breakfast badly; and the best way to get it, and at the same time to open new ground, was to walk to Dornum. Then I should find a blue line called the Neues Tief, leading to Dornumersiel, on the coast. That explored, I could pass on to Nesse, where there was another blue line to Nessmersiel. All this was on the way to Norden, and I should have the railway constantly at my back, to carry me there in the evening. The last train (my time-table told me) was one reaching Norden at 7.15 p.m. I could catch this at Hage Station at 7.5.

A brisk walk of six miles brought me, ravenously hungry, to Dornum. Road and railway had clung together all the time, and about half-way had been joined on the left by a third companion in the shape of a puny stream which I knew from the map to be the upper portion of Neues Tief. Wriggling and doubling like an eel, choked with sedges and reeds, it had no pretensions to being navigable. At length it looped away into the fens out of sight, only to reappear again close to Dornum in a much more dignified guise.

There was no siding where the railway crossed it, but at the town itself, which is skirted on the east, a tow-path began, and a piled wharf had been recently constructed. Going on to this was a red brick building with the look of a warehouse, roofless as yet, and with workmen on its scaffolds. It sharpened the edge of my appetite.

If I had been wise I should have been content with a snack bought at a counter, but a thirst for hot coffee and clues induced me to repeat the experiment of Esens and seek a primitive beer-house. I was less lucky on this occasion. The house I chose was obscure enough, but its proprietor was no simple Frisian, but an ill-looking rascal with shifty eyes and a debauched complexion, who showed a most unwelcome curiosity in his customer. As a last fatality, he wore a peaked cap like my own, and turned out to be an ex-sailor. I should have fled at the sight of him had I had the chance, but I was attended to first by a slatternly girl who, I am sure, called him up to view me. To explain my muddy boots and trousers I said I had walked from Esens, and from that I found myself involved in a tangle of impromptu lies. Floundering down an old groove, I placed my sister this time on Baltrum Island, and said I was going to Dornumersiel (which is opposite Baltrum) to cross from there. As this was drawing a bow at a venture, I dared not assume local knowledge, and spoke of the visit as my first. Dornumersiel was a lucky shot; there was a ferry-galliot from there to Baltrum; but he knew, or pretended to know, Baltrum, and had not heard of my sister. I grew the more nervous in that I saw from the first that he took me to be of better condition than most merchant seamen; and, to make matters worse, I was imprudent enough in pleading haste to pull out from an inner pocket my gold watch with the chain and seals attached. He told me there was no hurry, that I should miss the tide at Dornumersiel, and then fell to pressing strong waters on me, and asking questions whose insinuating grossness gave me the key to his biography. He must have been at one stage in his career a dock-side crimp, one of those foul sharks who prey on discharged seamen, and as often as not are ex-seamen themselves, versed in the weaknesses of the tribe. He was now keeping his hand in with me, who, unhappily, purported to belong to the very class he was used to victimise, and, moreover, had a gold watch, and, doubtless, a full purse. Nothing more ridiculously inopportune could have befallen me, or more dangerous; for his class are as cosmopolitan as waiters and concierges, with as facile a gift for language and as unerring a scent for nationality. Sure enough, the fellow recognised mine and positively challenged me with it in fairly fluent English with a Yankee twang. Encumbered with the mythical sister, of course I stuck to my lie, said I had been on an English ship so long that I had picked up the accent, and also gave him some words in broken English. At the same time I showed I thought him an impertinent nuisance, paid my score and walked out—quit of him? Not a bit of it! He insisted on showing me the way to Dornumersiel, and followed me down the street. Perceiving that he was in liquor, in spite of the early hour, I dared not risk a quarrelsome scene with a man who already knew so much about me, and might at any moment elicit more. So I melted, and humoured him; treated him in a ginshop in the hope of giving him the slip—a disastrous resource, which was made a precedent for further potations elsewhere. I would gladly draw a veil over our scandalous progress through peaceable Dornum, of the terrors I experienced when he introduced me as his friend, and as his English friend, and of the abasement I felt, too, as, linked arm in arm, we trod the three miles of road coastwards. It was his malicious whim that we should talk English; a fortunate whim, as it turned out, because I knew no fo'c'sle German, but had a smattering of fo'c'sle English, gathered from Cutcliffe Hyne and Kipling. With these I extemporised a disreputable hybrid, mostly consisting of oaths and blasphemies, and so yarned of imaginary voyages. Of course he knew every port in the world, but happily was none too critical, owing to repeated schnappsen.

Nevertheless, it was a deplorable contretemps from every point of view. I was wasting my time, for the road took a different direction to the Neues Tief, so that I had not even the advantage of inspecting the canal, and only met with it when we reached the sea. Here it split into two mouths, both furnished with locks, and emptying into two little mud-hole harbours, replicas of Bensersiel, each owning its cluster of houses. I made straight for the Gasthaus at Dornumersiel, primed my companion well, and asked him to wait while I say about a boat in the harbour; but, needless to say, I never rejoined him. I just took a cursory look at the left-hand harbour, saw a lighter locking through (for the tide was high), and then walked as fast as my legs would carry me to the outermost dyke, mounted it, and strode along the sea westwards in the teeth of a smart shower of rain, full of deep apprehensions as to the stir and gossip my disappearance might cause if my odious crimp was sober enough to discover it. As soon as I deemed it safe, I dropped on to the sand and ran till I could run no more. Then I sat on my bundle with my back to the dyke in partial shelter from the rain, watching the sea recede from the flats and dwindle into slender meres, and the laden clouds fly weeping over the islands till those pale shapes were lost in mist.

The barge I had seen locking through was creeping across towards Langeoog behind a tug and a wisp of smoke.

No more exploration by daylight! That was my first resolve, for I felt as if the country must be ringing with reports of an Englishman in disguise. I must remain in hiding till dusk, then regain the railway and slink into that train to Norden. Now directly I began to resign myself to temporary inaction, and to centre my thoughts on the rendezvous, a new doubt assailed me. Nothing had seemed more certain yesterday than that Norden was the scene of the rendezvous, but that was before the seven siels had come into prominence. The name Norden now sounded naked and unconvincing. As I wondered why, it suddenly occurred to me that all the stations along this northern line, though further in land than Norden, were equally "coast stations," in the sense that they were in touch with harbours (of a sort) on the coast. Norden had its tidal creek, but Esens and Dornum had their "tiefs" or canals. Fool that I had been to put such a narrow and literal construction on the phrase "the tide serves!" Which was it more likely that my conspirators would visit—Norden, whose intrusion into our theories was purely hypothetical, or one of these siels to whose sevenfold system all my latest observations gave such transcendent significance?

There was only one answer; and it filled me with profound discouragement. Seven possible rendezvous! —eight, counting Norden. Which to make for? Out came the time-table and map, and with them hope. The case was not so bad after all; it demanded no immediate change of plan, though it imported grave uncertainties and risks. Norden was still the objective, but mainly as a railway junction, only remotely as a seaport. Though the possible rendezvous were eight, the possible stations were reduced to five—Norden, Hage, Dornum, Esens, Wittmund—all on one single line. Trains from east to west along this line were negligible, because there were none that could be called night trains, the latest being the one I had this morning fixed on to bring me to Norden, where it arrived at 7.15. Of trains from west to east there was only one that need be considered, the same one that I had travelled by last night, leaving Norden at 7.43 and reaching Esens at 8.50, and Wittmund at 9.13. This train, as the reader who was with me in it knows, was in correspondence with another from Emden and the south, and also, I now found, with services from Hanover, Bremen, and Berlin. He will also remember that I had to wait three-quarters of an hour at Norden, from 7 to 7.43.

The platform at Norden Junction, therefore, between 7.15, when I should arrive at it from the east, and 7.43 when Böhme and his unknown friend should leave it for the east; there, and in that half-hour, was my opportunity for recognising and shadowing two at least of the conspirators. I must take the train they took, and alight where they alighted. If I could not find them at all I should be thrown back on the rejected view that Norden itself was the rendezvous, and should wait there till 10.46.

In the meantime it was all very well to resolve on inaction till dusk: but after an hour's rest, damp clothes and feet, and the absence of pursuers, tempted me to take the field again. Avoiding roads and villages as long as it was light, I cut across country south-westwards—a dismal and laborious journey, with oozy fens and knee-deep drains to course, with circuits to be made to pass clear of peasants, and many furtive crouchings behind dykes and willows. What little I learnt was in harmony with previous explorations, for my track cut at right angles the line of the Harke Tief, the stream issuing at Nessmersiel. It, too, was in the nature of a canal, but only in embryo at the point I touched it, south of Nesse. Works on a deviation were in progress, and in a short digression down stream I sighted another lighter-building yard. As for Hilgenriedersiel, the fourth of the seven, I had no time to see anything of it at all. At seven o'clock I was at Hage Station, very tired, wet and footsore, after covering nearly twenty miles all told since I left my bed in the lighter.

From here to Norden it was a run in the train of ten minutes, which I spent in eating some rye bread and smoked eel, and in scraping the mud off my boots and trousers. Fatigue vanished when the train drew up at the station, and the momentous twenty-eight minutes began to run their course. Having donned a bulky muffler and turned up the collar of my pea-jacket, I crossed over immediately to the up-platform, walked boldly to the booking-office, and at once sighted—von Brüning—yes, von Brüning in mufti ; but there was no mistaking his tall athletic figure, pleasant features, and neat brown beard. He was just leaving the window, gathering up a ticket and some coins. I joined a queue of three or four persons who were waiting their turn, flattened myself between them and the partition till I heard him walk out. Not having heard what station he had booked for, I took a fourth-class ticket to Wittmund, which covered all chances. Then, with my chin buried in my muffler, I sought the darkest corner of the ill-lit combination of bar and waiting-room where, by the tiresome custom in Germany, would-be travellers are penned till their train is ready. Von Brüning I perceived sitting in another corner, with his hat over his eyes and a cigar between his lips. A boy brought me a tankard of tawny Munich beer, and, sipping it, I watched. People passed in and out, but nobody spoke to the sailor in mufti. When a quarter of an hour elapsed, a platform door opened, and a raucous voice shouted : " Hage, Dornum, Esens, Wittmund ! " A knot of passengers jostled out to the platform, showing their tickets. I was slow over my beer, and was last of the knot, with von Brüning immediately ahead of me, so close that his cigar smoke curled into my face. I looked over his shoulder at the ticket he showed, missed the name, but caught a muttered double sibilant from the official who checked it ; ran over the stations in my head, and pounced on Esens. That was as much as I wanted to know for the present; so I made my way to a fourth-class compartment, and lost sight of my quarry, not venturing, till the last door had banged, to look out of the window. When I did so two late arrivals were hurrying up to a carriage—one tall, one of middle height; both in cloaks and comforters. Their features I could not distinguish, but certainly neither of them was Böhme. They had not come through the waiting-room door, but, plainly, from the dark end of the platform, where they had been waiting. A guard, with some surly remonstrances, shut them in, and the train started.

Esens—the name had not surprised me; it fulfilled a presentiment that had been growing in strength all the afternoon. For the last time I referred to the map, pulpy and blurred with the day's exposure, and tried to etch it into my brain. I marked the road to Bensersiel and how it converged by degrees on the Benser Tief until they met at the sea. "The tide serves!" Longing for Davies to help me, I reckoned, by the aid of my diary, that high tide at Bensersiel would be about eleven, and for two hours, I remembered (say from ten to twelve to-night), there were from five to six feet of water in the harbour.

We should reach Esens at 8.50. Would they drive as von Brüning had done a week ago? I tightened my belt, stamped my mud-burdened boots, and thanked God for the Munich beer. Whither were they going from Bensersiel, and in what; and how was I to follow them? These were nebulous questions, but I was in fettle for anything; boat-stealing was a bagatelle. Fortune, I thought, smiled; Romance beckoned; even the sea looked kind. Ay, and I do not know but that imagination was already beginning to unstiffen and flutter those nerveless wings.

CHAPTER XXVII

THE LUCK OF THE STOWAWAY

At Esens Station I reversed my Norden tactics, jumped out smartly, and got to the door of egress first of all, gave up my ticket, and hung about the gate of the station under cover of darkness. Fortune smiled still; there was no vehicle in waiting at all, and there were only half a dozen passengers. Two of these were the cloaked gentlemen who had been so nearly left behind at Norden, and another was von Brüning. The latter walked well in advance of the first pair, but at the gate on to the high road the three showed a common purpose, in that, unlike the rest, who turned towards Esens town, they turned southwards; much to my perplexity, for this was the contrary direction to Bensersiel and the sea. I, with my bundle on my shoulder, had been bringing up the rear, and, as their faithful shadow, turned to the right too, without foreseeing the consequence. When it was too late to turn back I saw that, fifty yards ahead, the road was barred by the gates of a level crossing, and that the four of us must inevitably accumulate at the barrier till the train had steamed away. This, in fact, happened, and for a minute or two we were all in a group, elaborately indifferent to one another, silent, but I am sure very conscious. As for me, "secret laughter tickled all my soul." When the gates were opened the three seemed disposed to lag, so I tactfully took my cue, trudged briskly on ahead, and stopped after a few minutes to listen. Hearing nothing I went cautiously back and found that they had disappeared; in which direction was not long in doubt, for I came on a grassy path leading into the fields on the left or west of the road, and though I could see no one I heard the distant murmur of receding voices.

I took my bearings collectedly, placed one foot on the path, thought better of it, and turned back towards Esens. I knew without reference to the map that that path would bring them to the Benser Tief at a point somewhere near the timber-yard. In a fog I might have followed them there; as it was, the night was none too dark, and I had my strength to husband; and stamped on my memory were the words "the tide serves." I judged it a wiser use of time and sinew to anticipate them at Bensersiel by the shortest road, leaving them to reach it by way of the devious Tief, to examine which was, I felt convinced, one of their objects.

It was nine o'clock of a fresh wild night, a halo round the beclouded moon. I passed through quiet Esens, and in an hour I was close to Bensersiel, and could hear the sea. In the rooted idea that I should find Grimm on the outskirts, awaiting visitors, I left the road short of the village, and made a circuit to the harbour by way of the sea-wall. The lower windows of the inn shed a warm glow into the night, and within I could see the village circle gathered over cards, and dominated as of old by the assertive little postmaster, whose high-pitched, excitable voice I could clearly distinguish, as he sat with his cap on the back of his head and a "feine schnapps" at his elbow. The harbour itself looked exactly the same as I remembered it a week ago. The post-boat lay in her old berth at the eastern jetty, her mainsail set and her twin giants spitting over the rail. I hailed them boldly from the shore (without showing them who I was), and was told they were starting for Langeoog in a few minutes; the wind was off-shore, the mails aboard, and the water just high enough. "Did I want a passage?" "No, I thought I would wait." Positive that my party could never have got here so soon, I nevertheless kept an eye on the galliot till she let go her stern-rope and slid away. One contingency was eliminated. Some loiterers dispersed, and all port business appeared to be ended for the night.

Three-quarters of an hour of strained suspense ensued. Most of it I spent on my knees in a dark angle between the dyke and the western jetty, whence I had a strategic survey of the basin; but I was driven at times to relieve inaction by sallies which increased in audacity. I scouted on the road beyond the bridge, hovered round the lock, and peered in at the inn parlour; but nowhere could I see a trace of Grimm. I examined every floating object in the harbour (they were very few), dropped on to two lighters and pried under tarpaulins, boarded a deserted tug and two or three clumsy rowboats tied up to a mooring-post. Only one of these had the look of readiness, the rest being devoid of oars and rowlocks; a discouraging state of things for a prospective boat-lifter. It was the sight of these rowboats that suggested a last and most distracting possibility, namely, that the boat in waiting, if boat there were, might be not in the harbour at all, but somewhere on the sands outside the dyke, where, at this high state of the tide, it would have water and to spare. Back to the dyke then; but as I peered seaward on the way, contingencies evaporated and a solid fact supervened, for I saw the lights of a steamboat approaching the harbour mouth. I had barely time to gain my coign of vantage before she had swept in between the piers, and with her fitful swizzling of her screw was turning and backing down to a berth just ahead of one of the lighters, and not fifty feet from my hiding-place. A deck-hand jumped ashore with a rope, while the man at the wheel gave gruff directions. The vessel was a small tug, and the man at the wheel disclosed his identity when, having rung off his engines, he jumped ashore also, looked at his watch in the beam of the side-light, and walked towards the village. It was Grimm, by the height and build—Grimm clad in a long tarpaulin coat and a sou'wester. I watched him cross the shaft of light from the inn window and disappear in the direction of the canal.

Another sailor now appeared and helped his fellow to tie up the tug. The two together then went aft and began to set about some job whose nature I could not determine. To emerge was perilous, so I set about a job of my own, tearing open my bundle and pulling an oilskin jacket and trousers over my clothes, and discarding my peaked cap for a sou'-wester. This operation was prompted instantaneously by the garb of two sailors who in hauling on the forward warp came into the field of the mast-head light.

It was something of a gymnastic masterpiece, since I was lying—or, rather, standing aslant—on the rough sea-wall, with crannies of brick for foothold and the water plashing below me; but then I had not lived in the Dulcibella for nothing. My chain of thought, fancy, was this—the tug is to carry my party; I can not shadow a tug in a rowboat, yet I intend to shadow ny party; I must therefore go with them in the tug, nd the first and soundest step is to mimic her crew. But the next step was a hard matter, for the crew having inished their job sat side by side on the bulwarks and it their pipes. However, a little pantomime soon occurred, as amusing as it was inspiriting. They seemed o consult together, looking from the tug to the inn nd from the inn to the tug. One of them walked a ew paces inn-wards and beckoned to the other, who n his turn called something down the engine-room sky-ight, and then joined his mate in a scuttle to the inn. Even while I watched the pantomime I was sliding off ny boots, and it had not been consummated a second before I had them in my arms and was tripping over the mud in my stocking feet. A dozen noiseless steps and I was over the bulwarks between the wheel and the smoke-stack, casting about for a hiding-place. The con-ventional stowaway hides in the hold, but there was only a stokehold here, occupied moreover; nor was there an empty apple-barrel, such as Jim of "Treasure Island" ound so useful. As far as I could see—and I dared not venture far for fear of the skylight—the surface of the leck offered nothing secure. But on the farther or star-board side, rather abaft the beam, there was a small boat in davits, swung outboard, to which common sense nd perhaps a vague prescience of its after utility, pointed irresistibly. In any case. discrimination was out f place, so I mounted the bulwark and gently entered ny refuge. The tackles creaked a trifle, oars and seats mpeded me; but well before the thirsty truants had eturned I was settled on the floor boards between two hwarts, so placed that I could, if necessary, peep over he gunwale.

The two sailors returned at a run, and very soon afte voices approached, and I recognised that of Herr Schenke chattering volubly. He and Grimm boarded the tug an went down a companion-way aft, near which, as peeped over, I saw a second skylight, no bigger than th Dulcibella's, illuminated from below. Then I heard cork drawn, and the kiss of glasses, and in a minute o two they re-emerged. It was apparent that Her Schenkel was inclined to stay and make merry, and tha Grimm was anxious to get rid of him, and none to courteous in showing it. The former urged that to morrow's tide would do, the latter gave orders to cas off, and at length observed with an angry oath tha the water was falling, and he must start; and, to clinc matters, with a curt good-night, he went to the whee and rang up his engines. Herr Schenkel landed an strutted off in high dudgeon, while the tug's screw be gan to revolve. We had only glided a few yards o when the engines stopped, a short blast of the whistl sounded, and, before I had had time to recast the future I heard a scurry of footsteps from the direction of th dyke, first on the bank, next on the deck. The last o these new arrivals panted audibly as he got aboard an dropped on the planks with an unelastic thud.

Her complement made up, the tug left the harbour but not alone. While slowly gathering way the hul checked all at once with a sharp jerk, recovered, an increased its speed. We had something in tow—what The lighter, of course, that had been lying astern of us.

Now I knew what was in that lighter, because I ha been to see, half an hour ago. It was no lethal cargo but coal, common household coal; not a full load o it, I remembered—just a good-sized mound amidships rimmed with battens fore and aft to prevent shifting.

Well," thought I, " this is intelligible enough. Grimm vas ostensibly there to call for a load of coal for Mem- nert. But does that mean we are going to Memmert ? " At the same time I recalled a phrase overheard at the epôt, " Only one—half a load." Why half a load ?

For some few minutes there was a good deal of move- nent on deck, and of orders shouted by Grimm and nswered by a voice from far astern on the lighter. Presently, however, the tug warmed to her work, the ull vibrated with energy, and an ordered peace reigned n board. I also realised that having issued from the oomed channel we had turned westward, for the wind, vhich had been blowing us fair, now blew strongly over he port beam.

I peeped out of my eyrie and was satisfied in a moment hat as long as I made no noise, and observed proper rudence, I was perfectly safe until the boat was wanted. There were no deck lamps ; the two skylights diffused ut a sickly radiance, and I was abaft the side-lights. was abaft the wheel also, though thrillingly near it in oint of distance—about twelve feet, I should say ; and Grimm was steering. The wheel, I should mention here, vas raised, as you often see them, on a sort of pulpit, pproached by two or three steps and fenced by a breast- igh arc of boarding. Only one of the crew was visible, nd he was acting as look-out in the extreme bows, the ays of the masthead lights—for a second had been oisted in sign of towage—glistening on his oilskin back. The other man, I concluded, was steering the lighter, vhich I could dimly locate by the pale foam at her bow.

And the passengers ? They were all together aft, hree of them, leaning over the taffrail, with their backs turned to me. One was short and stout—Böhme un questionably; the panting and the thud on the plank had prepared me for that, though where he had sprun from I did not know. Two were tall, and one of thes must be von Brüning. There ought to be four, I reck oned; but three were all I could see. And what of th third? It must be he who "insists on coming," th unknown superior at whose instance and for whose be hoof this secret expedition had been planned. And wh could he be? Many times, needless to say, I had aske myself that question, but never till now, when I ha found the rendezvous and joined the expedition, did i become one of burning import.

"Any weather" was another of those stored-u phrases that were apropos. It was a dirty, squally night not very cold, for the wind still hung in the S.S.W.— an off-shore wind on this coast, causing no appreciabl sea on the shoal spaces we were traversing. In th matter of our bearings, I set myself doggedly to over come that paralysing perplexity, always induced in m by night or fog in these intricate waters; and, by screw ing round and round, succeeded so far as to discove and identity two flashing lights—one alternately re and white, far and faint astern; the other right ahea and rather stronger, giving white flashes only. Th first and least familiar was, I made out, from the light house on Wangeroog; the second, well known to m as our beacon star in the race from Memmert, was th light on the centre of Norderney Island, about ten mile away.

I had no accurate idea of the time, for I could no see my watch, but I thought we must have starte about a quarter-past eleven. We were travelling fas he funnel belching out smoke and the bow-wave curling igh ; for the tug appeared to be a powerful little craft, nd her load was comparatively light.

So much for the general situation. As for my own redicament, I was in no mood to brood on the hazards f this mad adventure, a hundredfold more hazardous han my fog-smothered eaves-dropping at Memmert. he crisis, I knew, had come, and the reckless impu- ence that had brought me here must serve me still nd extricate me. Fortune loves rough wooing. I acked my luck and watched.

The behaviour of the passengers struck me as odd. hey remained in a row at the taffrail, gazing astern ike regretful emigrants, and sometimes gesticulating nd pointing. Now no vestige of the low land was isible, so I was driven to the conclusion that it was he lighter they were discussing ; and I date my awak- ning from the moment that I realised this. But the hread broke prematurely ; for the passengers took to acing the deck, and I had to lie low. When next I was ble to raise my head they were round Grimm at the wheel, engaged, as far as I could discover from their ges- ures, in an argument about our course and the time, or Grimm looked at his watch by the light of a hand- antern.

We were heading north, and I knew by the swell that ve must be near the Accumer Ee, the gap between Lange- og and Baltrum. Were we going out to open sea ? It ame over me with a rush that we must, if we were to rop this lighter at Memmert. Had I been Davies I hould have been quicker to seize certain rigid conditions f this cruise, which no human power could modify. We ad left after high tide. The water therefore was falling everywhere; and the tributary channels in rear of the islands were slowly growing impassable. It was quite thirty miles to Memmert, with three watersheds to pass; behind Baltrum, Norderney, and Juist. A skipper with nerve and perfect confidence might take us over one of these in the dark, but most of the run would infallibly have to be made outside. I now better understood the protests of Herr Schenkel to Grimm. Never once had we seen a lighter in tow in the open sea, though plenty behind the barrier of islands; indeed it was the very existence of the sheltered byways that created such traffic as there was. It was only Grimm's métier and the incubus of the lighter that had suggested Memmert as our destination at all, and I began to doubt it now. That tricky hoop of sand had befooled us before.

At this moment, and as if to corroborate my thought, the telegraph rang and the tug slowed down. I effaced myself and heard Grimm shouting to the man on the lighter to starboard his helm, and to the look-out to come aft. The next order froze my very marrow; it was "lower away." Someone was at the davits of my boat fingering the tackles; the forward fall-rope actually slipped in the block and tilted the boat a fraction. I was just wondering how far it was to swim to Langeoog when a strong, imperious voice (unknown to me) rang out, "No, no! We don't want the boat. The swell's nothing; we can jump! Can't we, Böhme?" The speaker ended with a jovial laugh. "Mercy!" thought I, "are they going to swim to Langeoog?" but I also gasped for relief. The tug rolled lifelessly in the swell for a little, and footsteps retreated aft. There were cries of "Achtung!" and some laughter, one big bump nd a good deal of grinding; and on we moved again, king the strain of the tow-rope gingerly, and then full- peed ahead. The passengers, it seemed, preferred the ghter to the tug for cruising in; coal-dust and exposure clean planks and a warm cuddy. When silence igned again I peeped out. Grimm was at the wheel ill, impassively twirling the spokes, with a glance ver his shoulder at his precious freight. And, after all, e were going outside.

Close on the port hand lay a black foam-girt shape, ne east of spit Baltrum. It fused with the night, while e swung slowly round to windward over the troubled ar. Now we were in the spacious deeps of the North ea; and feeling it too in increase of swell and volleys spray.

At this point evolutions began. Grimm gave the heel up to the look-out, and himself went to the taff- il, whence he roared back orders of "Port!" or "Star- oard!" in response to signals from the lighter. We ade one complete circle, steering on each point of the ind in succession, after that worked straight out to sea ll the water was a good deal rougher, and back again a tangent, till in earshot of the surf on the island each. There the manœuvres, which were clearly in the ature of a trial trip, ended; and we hove to, to tran- ip our passengers. They, when they came aboard, went raight below, and Grimm, having steadied the tug on settled course and entrusted the wheel to the sailor gain, stripped off his dripping oilskin coat, threw it own on the cabin skylight, and followed them. The ourse he had set was about west, with Norderney light couple of points off the port bow. The course for emmert? Possibly; but I cared not, for my mind was far from Memmert to-night. It was the course England too. Yes, I understood at last. I was assi ing at an experimental rehearsal of a great scene, to enacted, perhaps, in the near future—a scene wh multitudes of sea-going lighters, carrying full loads soldiers, not half loads of coals, should issue simulta ously, in seven ordered fleets, from seven shallow o lets, and, under escort of the Imperial Navy, trave the North Sea and throw themselves bodily upon Engl shores.

Indulgent reader, you may be pleased to say tha have been very obtuse ; and yet, with humility, I p test against that verdict. Remember that, recent are the events I am describing, it is only since th happened that the possibility of an invasion of Engla by Germany has become a topic of public discussi Davies and I had never—I was going to say had ne considered it ; but that would not be accurate, for had glanced at it once or twice ; and if any single in dent in his or our joint cruise had provided a semblan of confirmation, he, at any rate, would have kindled that spark. But you will see how perversely from fi to last circumstances drove us deeper and deeper i the wrong groove, till the idea became inveterate t the secret we were seeking was one of defence and offence. Hence a complete mental somersault was quired, and, as an amateur, I found it difficult ; more so that the method of invasion, as I darkly co prehended it now, was of such a strange and unpre dented character ; for orthodox invasions start fr big ports and involve a fleet of ocean transports, wh none of our clues pointed that way. To neglect obvi methods, to draw on the obscure resources of an obsc strip of coast, to improve and exploit a quantity of insignificant streams and tidal outlets, and thence, screened by the islands, to despatch an armada of light-draught barges, capable of flinging themselves on a correspondingly obscure and therefore unexpected portion of the enemy's coast; that was a conception so daring, aye, and so quixotic in some of its aspects, that even now I was half incredulous. Yet it must be the true one. Bit by bit the fragments of the puzzle fell into order till a coherent whole was adumbrated.*

The tug surged on into the night; a squall of rain leapt upon us and swept hissing astern. Baltrum vanished and the strands of Norderney beamed under transient moonlight. Drunk with triumph, I cuddled in my rocking cradle and ransacked every unvisited chamber of the memory, tossing out their dusty contents, to make a joyous bonfire of some, and to see the residue take life and meaning in the light of the great revelation.

My reverie was of things, not persons; of vast national issues rather than of the poignant human interests so closely linked with them. But on a sudden I was recalled, with a shock, to myself, Davies, and the present.

We were changing our course, as I knew by variations in the whirl of draughts which whistled about me. I heard Grimm afoot again, and, choosing my moment, surveyed the scene. Broad on the port-beam were the garish lights of Norderney town and promenade, and the tug, I perceived, was drawing in to enter the See-Gat † Round she came, hustling through the broken water of the bar, till her nose was south and the wind was on the starboard bow. Not a mile from me were the villa and the yacht, and the three persons of th drama—three, that is, if Davies were safe.

* The reader will find the whole matter dealt with in the Epilogue.

† See Chart B.

Were we to land at Norderney harbour? Heavens what a magnificent climax!—if only I could rise to it My work here was done. At a stroke to rejoin Davie and be free to consummate our designs!

A desperate idea of cutting the davit-tackles—I blus to think of the stupidity—was rejected as soon as it wa born, and instead, I endeavoured to imagine our ap proach to the pier. My boat hung on the starboar side; that would be the side away from the quay, an the tide would be low. I could swarm down the davit during the stir of arrival, drop into the sea and swi the few yards across the dredged-out channel, wad through the mud to within a short distance of the Dulci bella, and swim the rest. I rubbed the salt out of m eyes and wriggled my cramped legs. . . . Hullo! wh was Grimm leaving the helm again? Back he went t the cabin, leaving the sailor at the helm. . . . W ought to be turning to port now; but no—on we went south, for the mainland.

Though one plan was frustrated, the longing to ge to Davies, once implanted, waxed apace.

Our destination was at last beyond dispute.* Th channel we were in was the same that we had cut acros on our blind voyage to Memmert, and the same m ferry-steamer had followed two days ago. It was cul-de-sac leading to one place only, the landing stag at Norddeich. The only place on the whole coast, no I came to think of it, where the tug could land at thi tide. There the quay would be on the starboard side and I saw myself tied to my eyrie while the passenger anded and the tug and lighter turned back for Memmert; at Memmert, dawn, and discovery.

* See Chart.

There was some way out—some way out, I repeated to myself; some way to reap the fruit of Davies's long utelage in the lore of this strange region. What would ie do?

For answer there came the familiar frou-frou of gentle surf on drying sands. The swell was dying away, the channel narrowing; dusky and weird on the starboard hand stretched leagues of new-risen sand. Two men only were on deck; the moon was quenched under the vanguard clouds of a fresh squall.

A madcap scheme danced before me. The time, I must know the time! Crouching low and cloaking the flame with my jacket I struck a match; 2.30 a.m.—the tide had been ebbing for about three hours and a half. Low water about five; they would be aground till 7.30. Danger to life? None. Flares and rescuers? Not likely, with "him who insists" on board; besides, no one could come, there being no danger. I should have a fair wind and a fair tide for my trip. Grimm's coat was on the skylight; we were both clean shaved.

The helmsman gazed ahead, intent on his difficult course, and the wind howled to perfection. I knelt up and examined one of the davit-tackles. There was nothing remarkable about it, a double and a single block (like our own peak halyards), the lower one hooked into a ring in the boat, the hauling part made fast to a cleat on the davit itself. Something there must be to give lateral support or the boat would have racketed abroad in the roll outside. The support, I found, consisted of two lanyards spliced to the davits and rove through holes in the keel. These I leaned over and cut with my pocket-knife; the result being a barely perceptible swaying of the boat, for the tug was under the lee of sands and on an even keel. Then I left my hiding-place, climbing out of the stern sheets by the after-davit and preparing every successive motion with exquisite tenderness, till I stood on the deck. In another moment I was at the cabin sky ight, lifting Grimm's long oilskin coat. (A second's yielding to temptation here; but no, the skylight was ground glass, fastened from below. So, on with the coat, up with the collar, and forward to the wheel on tiptoe.) As soon as I was up to the engine-room skylight (that is to say, well ahead of the cabin roof) I assumed a natural step, went up to the pulpit and touched the helmsman on the arm, as I had seen Grimm do. The man stepped aside, grunting something about a light, and I took the wheel from him. Grimm was a man of few words, so I just jogged his satellite and pointed forward. He went off like a lamb to his customary place in the bows, not having dreamt—why should he?—of examining me, but in him I had instantly recognised one of the crew of the Kormoran.

My ruse developed in all its delicious simplicity. We were, I estimated, about half-way to Norddeich, in the Buse Tief, a channel of a navigable breadth, at the utmost of two hundred yards at this period of the tide. Two faint lights, one above the other, twinkled far ahead. What they meant I neither knew not cared, since the only use I put them to was to test the effect of the wheel, for this was the first time I had ever tasted the sweets of command on a steamboat. A few cautious essays taught me the rudiments, and nothing could hinder the catastrophe now.

I edged over to starboard—that was the side I had elected—and again a little more, till the glistening back ff the look-out gave a slight movement; but he was a vell-drilled minion, with implicit trust in the "old man." Now, hard over! and spoke by spoke I gave her the ull pressure of the helm. The look-out shouted a warning, and I raised my arm in calm acknowledgment. A cry came from the lighter, and I remember I was just hinking "What the dickens'll happen to her?" when he end came; a euthanasia so mild and gradual (for he sands are fringed with mud) that the disaster was on us before I was aware of it. There was just the iniest premonitory shuddering as our keel clove the uttery medium, a cascade of ripples from either beam, nd the wheel jammed to rigidity in my hands, as the ug nestled up to her resting-place.

In the scene of panic that followed, it is safe to say hat I was the only soul on board who acted with methodi- al tranquillity. The look-out flew astern like an arrow, awling to the lighter. Grimm, with the passengers umbling up after him, was on deck in an instant, storm- ng and cursing; flung himself on the wheel which I ad respectfully abandoned, jangled the telegraph, and renched at the spokes. The tug listed over under the orce of the tide; wind, darkness, and rain aggravated he confusion.

For my part, I stepped back behind the smoke stack, hrew off my robe of office, and made for the boat. ong and bitter experience of running aground had told ne that that was sure to be wanted. On the way I annoned into one of the passengers and pressed him nto my service; incidentally seeing his face, and verify- ng an old conjecture. It was one who, in Germany, as a better right to insist than anyone else.

As we reached the davits there was a report like a pistol-shot from the port-side—the tow-rope parting, I believe, as the lighter with her shallower draught swung on past the tug. Fresh tumult arose, in which I heard "Lower the boat," from Grimm; but the order was already executed. My ally the Passenger and I had each cast off a tackle, and slacked away with a run: that done, I promptly clutched the wire guy to steady myself, and tumbled in. (It was not far to tumble, for the tug listed heavily to starboard; think of our course and the set of the ebb stream, and you will see why. The forward fall unhooked sweetly; but the after one lost play. "Slack away," I called, peremptorily, and felt for my knife. My helper above obeyed; the hook yielded; I filliped away the loose tackle, and the boat floated away.

CHAPTER XXVIII

WE ACHIEVE OUR DOUBLE AIM

When, exactly, the atmosphere of misunderstanding on the stranded tug was dissipated, I do not know, for by the time I had fitted the rowlocks and shipped sculls tide and wind had caught me, and were sweeping me merrily back on the road to Norderney, whose lights twinkled through the scud in the north. With my first few strokes I made towards the lighter—which I could see sagging helplessly to leeward—but as soon as I thought I was out of sight of the tug, I pulled round and worked out my own salvation. There was an outburst of shouting which soon died away. Full speed on a falling tide! They were pinned there for five hours sure. It was impossible to miss the way, and with my stout allies heaving me forward, I made short work of the two-mile passage. There was a sharp tussle at the last, where the Riff-Gat poured its stream across my path, and then I was craning over my shoulder, God knows with what tense anxiety, for the low hull and taper mast of the Dulcibella. Not there! No, not where I had left her. I pulled furiously up the harbour past a sleeping ferry-steamer and—praise Heaven!—came on her warped alongside the jetty.

"Who's that?" came from below, as I stepped on board.

"Hush! it's me." And Davies and I were pawing one another in the dark of the cabin.

"Are you all right, old chap?" said he.

"Yes; are you? A match! What's the time? Quick!"

"Good Heavens, Carruthers, what the blazes have you done to yourself?" (I suspect I cut a pretty figure after my two days' outing.)

"Ten past three. It's the invasion of England! Is Dollmann at the villa?"

"Invasion?"

"Is Dollman at the villa?"

"Yes."

"Is the Medusa afloat?"

"No, on the mud."

"The devil! Are we afloat?"

"I think so still, but they made me shift."

"Think! Track her out! Pole her out! Cut those warps!"

For a few strenuous minutes we toiled at the sweeps till the Dulcibella was berthed ahead of the steamer, in deeper water. Meanwhile I had whispered a few facts.

"How soon can you get under way?" I asked.

"Ten minutes."

"When's daylight?"

"Sunrise about seven, first dawn about five. Wher are we bound?"

"Holland, or England."

"Are they invading it now?" said Davies, calmly.

"No, only rehearsing!" I laughed, wildly.

"Then we can wait."

"We can wait exactly an hour and a half. Com ashore and knock up Dollmann; we must denounc him, and get them both aboard; it's now or neve Holy Saints! man, not as you are!" (He was in pyja mas.) "Sea clothes!"

While he put on Christian attire, I resumed my fact and sketched a plan. "Are you watched?" I asked.

"I think so; by the Kormoran's men."

"Is the Kormoran here?"

"Yes."

"The men?"

"Not to-night. Grimm called for them in that tu I was watching. And, Carruthers, the Blitz is here."

"Where?"

"In the roads outside—didn't you see her?"

"Wasn't looking. Her skipper's safe anyway; so Böhme, so's the Tertium Quid, and so are the Kormoran men. The coast's clear—it's now or never."

Once more we were traversing the long jetty and th silent streets, rain driving at our backs. We trod o air, I think; I remember no fatigue. Davies sometime broke into a little run, muttering "scoundrel" to him self.

"I was right—only upside down," he murmured mo than once. "Always really right—those channels are the key to the whole concern. Chatham, our only eastern base—no North Sea base or squadron—they'd land at one of those God-forsaken flats off the Crouch and Blackwater."

"It seems a wild scheme," I observed.

"Wild? In a way. So is any invasion. But it's thorough; it's German. No other country could do it. It's all dawning on me—by Jove! It will be at the Wash—much the nearest, and as sandy as this side."

"How's Dollmann been?" I asked.

"Polite, but queer and jumpy. It's too long a story."

"Clara?"

"She's all right. By Jove! Carruthers—never mind."

We found a night-bell at the villa door and rang it lustily. A window aloft opened, and "A message from Commander von Brüning—urgent," I called up.

The window shut, and soon after the hall was lighted and the door opened by Dollmann in a dressing-gown.

"Good morning, Lieutenant X——," I said, in English. "Stop, we're friends, you fool!" as the door was flung nearly to. It opened very slowly again, and we walked in.

"Silence!" he hissed. The sweat stood on his steep forehead and a hectic flush on either cheek, but there was a smile—what a smile!—on his lips. Motioning us to tread noiselessly (a vain ideal for me), he led the way to the sitting-room we knew, switched on the light, and faced us.

"Well?" he said, in English, still smiling.

I consulted my watch, and I may say that if my hand was an index to my general appearance, I must have looked the most abject ruffian under heaven.

"We probably understand one another," I said, "and to explain is lose time. We sail for Holland, or perhaps England, at five at the latest, and we want the pleasure of your company. We promise you immunity—on certain conditions, which can wait. We have only two berths, so that we can only accommodate Miss Clara besides yourself." He smiled on through this terse harangue, but the smile froze, as though beneath it raged some crucial debate. Suddenly he laughed (a low, ironical laugh).

"You fools," he said, "you confounded meddlesome young idiots; I thought I had done with you. Promise me immunity? Give me till five? By God, I'll give you five minutes to be off to England and be damned to you, or else to be locked up for spies! What the devil do you take me for?"

"A traitor in German service," said Davies, none too firmly. We were both taken aback by this slashing attack.

"A tr——? You pig-headed young marplots! I'm in British service! You're wrecking the work of years—and on the very threshold of success."

For an instant Davies and I looked at one another in stupefaction. He lied—I could swear he lied; but how make sure?

"Why did you try to wreck Davies?" said I, mechanically.

"Pshaw! They made me clear him out. I knew he was safe, and safe he is."

There was only one thing for it—a last finesse, to put him to the proof.

"Very well," I said, after a moment or two, "we'll clear out—silence, Davies!—as it appears we have acted in error; but it's right to tell you that we know everything."

"Not so loud, curse you! What do you know?"

"I was taking notes at Memmert the other night."

"Impossible!"

"Thanks to Davies. Under difficulties, of course, but I heard quite enough. You were reporting your English tour—Chatham, you know, and the English scheme of attack, a mythical one, no doubt, as you're on the right side! Böhme and the rest were dealing with the German scheme of defence. A to G—I heard it all—the seven islands and the seven channels between them (Davies knows every one of them by heart); and then on land, the ring of railway, Esens the centre, the army corps to mobilise and entrench—all nugatory, wasted, ha! ha! —as you're on the right s——"

"Not so loud, you fiend of mischief!" He turned his back, and made an irresolute pace or two towards the door, his hands kneading the folds of his dressing-gown as they had kneaded the curtain at Memmert. Twice he began a question and twice broke off. "I congratulate you, gentlemen," he said, finally, and with more composure, facing us again, "you have done marvels in your misplaced zeal; but you have compromised me too much already. I shall have to have you arrested —purely for form's sake——"

"Thank you," I broke in. "We have wasted five minutes, and time presses. We sail at five, and—purely for form's sake—would rather have you with us."

"What do you mean?" he snarled.

"I had the advantage of you at Memmert, in spite of acoustic obstacles. Your friends made an appointment behind your back, and I, in my misplaced zeal, have taken some trouble to attend it; so that I've had a working demonstration on another matter, the invasion of England from the seven siels." (Davies nudged me.) "No, I should let that pistol alone; and no, I wouldn't ring the bell. You can arrest us if you like, but the secret's in safe hands."

"You lie!" He was right there; but he could not know it.

"Do you suppose I haven't taken that precaution? But no names are mentioned." He gave a sort of groan, sank into a chair, and seemed to age and grizzle before our very eyes.

"What did you say about immunity, and Clara?" he muttered.

"We're friends—we're friends!" burst out Davies, with a gulp in his voice. "We want to help you both." (Through a sudden mist that filmed my eyes I saw him impetuously walk over and lay his hand on the other's shoulder.) "Those chaps are on our track and yours. Come with us. Wake her, tell her. It'll be too late soon."

X—— shrank from his touch. "Tell her? I can't tell her. You tell her, boy." He was huddling back into his chair. Davies turned to me.

"Where's her room?" I said, sharply.

"Above this one."

"Go up, Carruthers," said Davies.

"Not I—I shall frighten her into a fit."

"I don't like to."

"Nonsense, man! We'll both go then."

"Don't make a noise," said a dazed voice. We left that huddled figure and stole upstairs—thickly carpeted stairs, luckily. The door we wanted was half open, and the room behind it lighted. On the threshold stood a slim white figure, bare-footed, bare-throated.

"What is it, father?" she called in a whisper. "Whom have you been talking to?" I pushed Davies forward, but he hung back.

"Hush, don't be frightened," I said, "it's I, Carruthers, and Davies—and Davies. May we come in, just for one moment?"

I gently widened the opening of the door, while she stepped back and put one hand to her throat.

"Please come to your father," I said. "We are going to take you both to England in the Dulcibella—now, at once."

She had heard me, but her eyes wandered to Davies.

"I understand not," she faltered, trembling and cowering in such touching bewilderment that I could not bear to look at her.

"For God's sake, say something, Davies," I muttered.

"Clara!" said Davies, "will you not trust us?"

I heard a little gasp from her. There was a flutter of lace and cambric and she was in his arms, sobbing like a tired child, her little white feet between his great clumsy sea-boots—her rose-brown cheek on his rough jersey.

"It's past four, old chap," I remarked, brutally. "I'm going down to him again. No packing to speak of, mind. They must be out of this in half an hour." I stumbled awkwardly on the stairs (again that tiresome film!), and found him stuffing some papers pell-mell into the stove. There were only slumbering embers in it, but he did not seem to notice that. "You must be dressed in half an hour," I said, furtively pocketing a pistol which lay on the table.

"Have you told her? Take her to England, you two boys. I think I'll stay." He sank into a chair again.

"Nonsense, she won't go without you. You must, for her sake—in half an hour, too."

I prefer to pass that half-hour lightly over. Davies left before me to prepare the yacht for sea, and I had to bear the brunt of what followed, including (as a mere episode) a scene with the step-mother, the memory of which rankles in me yet. After all, she was a sensible woman.

As for the other two, the girl when I saw her next, in her short boating skirt and Tam-o'-shanter, was a miracle of coolness and pluck. But for her I should never have got him away. And ah! how good it was to be out in the wholesome rain again, hurrying to the harbour with my two charges, hurrying them down the greasy ladder to that frail atom of English soil, their first guerdon of home and safety.

Our flight from the harbour was unmolested, unnoticed. Only the first ghastly evidences of dawn were mingling with the strangled moonlight, as we tacked round the pier-head and headed close-reefed down the Riff-Gat on the lees of the ebb-tide. We had to pass under the very quarter of the Blitz, so Davies said; for, of course, he alone was on deck till we reached the open sea. Day was breaking then. It was dead low water, and, far away to the south, between dun swathes of sand, I thought I saw—but probably it was only a fancy—two black stranded specks. Rail awash, and decks streaming, we took the outer swell and clawed close-hauled under the lee of Juist, westward, hurrying westward.

"Up the Ems on the flood, and to Dutch Delfzyl," I urged. No, thought Davies; it was too near Germany, and there was a tidal cut through from Buse Tief. Better to dodge in behind Rottum Island. So on we pressed, past Memmert, over the Juister Reef and the Corinne's buried millions, across the two broad and yeasty mouths of the Ems, till Rottum, a wee lonesome wafer of an islet, the first of the Dutch archipelago, was close on the weather-bow.

"We must get in behind that," said Davies, "then we shall be safe; I think I know the way, but get the next chart; and then take a rest, old chap. Clara and I can manage." (She had been on deck most of the time, as capable a hand as you could wish for, better far than I in my present state of exhaustion.) I crawled along the slippery sloping planks and went below.

"Where are we?" cried Dollmann, starting up from the lee sofa, where he seemed to have been lying in a sort of trance. A book, his own book, slipped from his knees, and I saw the frontispiece lying on the floor in a pool of oil; for the stove had gone adrift, and the saloon was in a wretched state of squalor and litter.

"Off Rottum," I said, and knelt up to find the chart. There was a look in his eyes that I suppose I ought to have understood, but I can scarcely blame myself, for the accumulated strain, not only of the last three days and nights, but of the whole arduous month of my cruise with Davies, was beginning to tell on me, now that safety and success were at hand. I handed up the chart through the companion, and then crept into the reeling fo'c'sle and lay down on the spare sail-bags, with the thunder and thump of the seas around and above me.

I must quote Davies for the event that happened now; for by the time I had responded to the alarm and climbed up through the fore-hatch, the whole tragedy was over and done with.

"X—— came up the companion," he says, "soon after you went down. He held on by the runner, and stared to windward at Rottum, as though he knew the place quite well. And then he came towards us, moving so unsteadily that I gave Clara the tiller, and went to help him. I tried to make him go down again, but he wouldn't, and came aft.

"'Give me the helm,' he said, half to himself. 'Sea's too bad outside—there's a short cut here.'

"'Thanks,' I said, 'I know this one.' (I don't think I meant to be sarcastic.) He said nothing, and settled himself on the counter behind us, safe enough, with his feet against the lee-rail, and then, to my astonishment, began to talk over my shoulder jolly sensibly about the course, pointing out a buoy which is wrong on the chart (as I knew), and telling me it was wrong, and so on. Well, we came to the bar of the Schild, and had to turn south for that twisty bit of beating between Rottum and Bosch Flat. Clara was at the jib-sheet, I had the chart and the tiller (you know how absent I get like that); there was a bobble of sea, and we both had heaps to do, and—well—I happened to look round, and he was gone. He hadn't spoken for a minute or two, but I believe the last thing I heard him say (I was hardly attending at the time, for we were in the thick of it) was something about a 'short cut' again. He must have slipped over quietly . . . He had an ulster and big boots on."

We cruised about for a time, but never found him.

That evening, after threading the maze of shoals between the Dutch mainland and islands, we anchored off the little hamlet of Ostmahorn,* gave the yacht in charge of some astonished fishermen, and thence by road and rail, hurrying still, gained Harlingen, and took passage on a steamer to London. From that point our personal history is of no concern to the outside world, and here, therefore, I bring this narrative to an end.

EPILOGUE †

BY THE EDITOR

An interesting document, somewhat damaged by fire, lies on my study table.

It is a copy (in cipher) of a confidential memorandum to the German Government embodying a scheme for the invasion of England by Germany. It is unsigned, but internal evidence, and the fact that it was taken by Mr. "Carruthers" from the stove of the villa at Norderney, leave no doubt as to its authorship. For many reasons it is out of the question to print the textual translation of it, as deciphered; but I propose to give an outline of its contents.

Even this must strain discretion to its uttermost limits, and had I only to consider the instructed few who follow the trend of professional opinion on such subjects, I should leave the foregoing narrative to speak for itself. But, as was stated in the preface, our primary purpose is to reach everyone; and there may be many who, in spite of able and authoritative warnings frequently uttered since these events occurred, are still prone to treat the German danger as an idle "bogey," and may be disposed, in this case, to imagine that a baseless romance has been foisted on them.

* See Map A. † For this chapter see Map A.

A few persons (English as well as German) hold that Germany is strong enough now to meet us single-handed, and throw an army on our shores. The memorandum rejects this view, deferring isolated action for at least a decade; and supposing, for present purposes, a coalition of three Powers against Great Britain. And subsequent researches through the usual channels place it beyond dispute that this condition was relied on by the German Government in adopting the scheme. They realised that even if, owing to our widely scattered forces, they gained that temporary command of the North Sea which would be essential for a successful landing, they would inevitably lose it when our standing fleets were concentrated and our reserve ships mobilised. With its sea-communications cut, the prospects of the invading army would be too dubious. I state it in that mild way, for it seems not to have been held that failure was absolutely certain; and rightly, I think, in spite of the dogmas of the strategists—for the case transcends all experience. No man can calculate the effect on our delicate economic fabric of a well-timed, well-planned blow at the industrial heart of the kingdom, the great northern and midland towns, with their teeming populations of peaceful wage-earners. In this instance, however, joint action (the occasion for which is perhaps not difficult to guess) was distinctly contemplated, and Germany's rôle in the coalition was exclusively that of invader. Her fleet was to be kept intact, and she herself to remain ostensibly neutral until the first shock was over, and our own battle-fleets either beaten, or, the much more likely event, so crippled by a hard-won victory as to be incapable of withstanding compact and unscathed forces. Then, holding the balance of power, she would strike. And the blow? It was not till I read this memorandum that I grasped the full merits of that daring scheme, under which every advantage, moral, material, and geographical, possessed by Germany, is utilised to the utmost, and every disadvantage of our own turned to account against us.

Two root principles pervade it: perfect organisation; perfect secrecy. Under the first head come some general considerations. The writer (who is intimately conversant with conditions on both sides of the North Sea) argued that Germany is pre-eminently fitted to undertake an invasion of Great Britain. She has a great army (a mere fraction of which would suffice) in a state of high efficiency, but a useless weapon, as against us, unless transported over seas. She has a peculiar genius for organisation, not only in elaborating minute detail, but in the grasp of a coherent whole. She knows the art of giving a brain to a machine, of transmitting power to the uttermost cog-wheel, and at the same time of concentrating responsibility in a supreme centre. She has a small navy, but very effective for its purpose, built, trained, and manned on methodical principles, for defined ends, and backed by an inexhaustible reserve of men from her maritime conscription. She studies and practises co-operation between her army and navy. Her hands are free for offence in home waters, since she has no distant network of coveted colonies and dependencies on which to dissipate her defensive energies. Finally, she is, compared with ourselves, economically independent, having commercial access through her land frontiers to the whole of Europe. She has little to lose and much to gain.

The writer pauses here to contrast our own situation, and I summarise his points. We have a small army dispersed over the whole globe, and administered on a gravely defective system. We have no settled theory of national defence, and no competent authority whose business it is to give us one. The matter is still at the stage of civilian controversy. Co-operation between the army and navy is not studied and practised; much less do there exist any plans, worthy of the name, for the repulse of an invasion, or any readiness worth considering for the prompt equipment and direction of our home forces to meet a sudden emergency. We have a great and, in many respects, a magnificent navy, but not great enough for the interests it insures, and with equally defective institutions; not built or manned methodically, having an utterly inadequate reserve of men, all classes of which would be absorbed at the very outset, without a vestige of preparation for the enrolment of volunteers, distracted by the multiplicity of its functions in guarding our colossal empire and commerce, and conspicuously lacking a brain, not merely for the smooth control of its own unwieldy mechanism, but for the study of rival aims and systems. We have no North Sea naval base, no North Sea Fleet, and no North Sea policy. Lastly, we stand in a highly dangerous economical position.

The writer then deals with the method of invasion, and rejects the obvious one at once, that of sending forth a fleet of transports from one or more of the North Sea ports. He combats especially the idea of making Emden (the nearest to our shores) the port of departure. I mention this because, since his own scheme was adopted, it is instructive to note that Emden has been used (with caution) as a red herring by the inspired German press when the subject was mentioned at all, and industriously dragged across the trail. His objections to the North Sea ports apply, he remarks, in reality to all schemes of invasion, whether the conditions be favourable or not. One is that secrecy is rendered impossible—and secrecy is vital. The collection of the transports would be known in England weeks before the hour was ripe for striking; for all large ports are cosmopolitan and swarm with potential spies. In Germany's case, moreover, suitable ships are none too plentiful, and the number required would entail a large deduction from her mercantile marine. The other reason concerns the actual landing. This must take place on an open part of the east coast of England. No other objective is even considered. Now the difficulty of transhipping and landing troops by boats from transports anchored in deep water, in a safe, swift, and orderly fashion, on an open beach, is enormous. The most hastily improvised resistance might cause a humiliating disaster. Yet the first stage is the most important of all. It is imperative that the invaders should seize and promptly intrench a prearranged line of country, to serve as an initial base. This once done, they can use other resources; they can bring up transports, land cavalry and heavy guns, pour in stores, and advance. But unless this is done, they are impotent, be their sea-communications never so secure.

The only logical alternative is then propounded: to despatch an army of infantry with the lightest type of field-guns in big sea-going lighters, towed by powerful but shallow-draught tugs, under escort of a powerful composite squadron of warships; and to fling the flotilla, at high tide, if possible, straight upon the shore.

Such an expedition could be prepared in absolute secrecy, by turning to account the natural features of the German coast. No great port was to be concerned in any way. All that was required was sufficient depth of water to float the lighters and tugs; and this is supplied by seven insignificant streams, issuing from the Frisian littoral, and already furnished with small harbours and sluice-gates, with one exception, namely, the tidal creek at Norden; for this, it appeared, was one of the chosen seven, and not, as "Carruthers" supposed, Hilgenriedersiel, which, if you remember, he had no time to visit, and which has, in fact, no stream of any value at all, and no harbour. All of these streams would have to be improved, deepened, and generally canalised; ostensibly with a commercial end, for purposes of traffic with the islands, which are growing health resorts during a limited summer season.

The whole expedition would be organised under seven distinct sub-divisions—not too great a number in view of its cumbrous character. Seawards, the whole of the coast is veiled by the fringe of islands and the zone of shoals. Landwards, the loop of railway round the Frisian peninsula would form the line of communication in rear of the seven streams. Esens was to be the local centre of administration when the scheme grew to maturity, but not till then. Every detail for the movement of troops under the seven different heads was to be arranged for with secrecy and exactitude many months in advance, and from headquarters at Berlin. It was not expected that nothing would leak out, but care was to be taken that anything that did do so should be attributed to defensive measures—a standing feature in German mobilisation being the establishment of a corps of observation along the Frisian coast; in fact, the same machinery was to be used, and its conversion for offence concealed up to the latest possible moment. The same precautions were to be taken in the preliminary work on the spot. There, four men only (it was calculated) need be in full possession of the secret. One was to represent the Imperial Navy (a post filled by our friend von Brüning). Another (Böhme) was to superintend the six canals and the construction of the lighters. The functions of the third were twofold. He was to organise what I may call the local labour—that is, the helpers required for embarkation, the crews of the tugs, and, most important of all, the service of pilots for the navigation of the seven flotillas through the corresponding channels to the open sea. He must be a local man, thoroughly acquainted with the coast, of a social standing not much above the average of villagers and fishermen, and he must be ready when the time was ripe with lists of the right men for the right duties, lists to which the conscription authorities could, when required, give instant legal effect. His other function was to police the coast for spies, and to report anything suspicious to von Brüning, who would never be far away. On the whole I think that they found the grim Grimm a jewel for their purpose.

As fourth personage, the writer designates himself, the promoter of the scheme, the indispensable link between the two nations. He undertakes to furnish reliable information as to the disposition of troops in England, as to the hydrography of the coast selected for the landing, as to the supplies available in its vicinity, and the strategic points to be seized. He proposes to be guide-in-chief to the expedition during transit. And in the meantime (when not otherwise employed) he was to reside at Norderney, in close touch with the other three, and controlling the commercial undertakings which were to throw dust in the eyes of the curious. [Memmert, by the way, is not mentioned in this memorandum.]

He speaks of the place "selected for the landing," and proceeds to consider this question in detail. I cannot follow him in his review, deeply interesting though it is, and shall say at once that he reduces possible landing-places to two, the flats on the Essex coast between Foulness and Brightlingsea, and the Wash—with a decided preference for the latter. Assuming that the enemy, if they got wind of an invasion at all, would expect transports to be employed, he chooses the sort of spot which they would be least likely to defend, and which, nevertheless, was suitable to the character of the flotillas, and similar to the region they started from. There is such a spot on the Lincolnshire coast, on the north side of the Wash,* known as East Holland. It is low-lying land, dyked against the sea, and bordered like Frisia with sand-flats which dry off at low water. It is easy of access from the east, by way of Boston Deeps, a deep-water channel formed by a detached bank, called the Long Sand, lying parallel to the shore for ten miles. This bank makes a natural breakwater against the swell from the east (the only quarter to be feared); and the Deeps behind it, where there is an average depth of thirty-four feet at low-water, would form an excellent roadstead for the covering squadron, whose guns would command the shore within easy range. It is noted in passing that this is just the case where German first-class battleships would have an advantage over British ships of the same calibre. The latter are of just too heavy a draught to navigate such waters without peril, if, indeed, they could enter this roadstead at all, for there is a bar at the mouth of it with only thirty-one feet at high water, spring tides. The former, built as they were with a view to manœuvring in the North Sea, are just within the margin of safety. East Holland is within easy striking distance of the manufacturing districts, a vigorous raid on which is, the writer urges, the true policy of an invader. He reports positively that there exist (in a proper military sense) no preparations whatever to meet such an attack. East Holland is also the nearest point on the British shores to Germany, excepting the coast of Norfolk; much nearer, indeed, than the Essex flats alluded to, and reached by a simple deep-sea passage, without any dangerous region to navigate, like the mouth of the Channel and the estuary of the Thames from Harwich westwards. The distance is 240 sea-miles, west by south roughly, from Borkum Island, and 280 from Wangeroog. The time estimated for transit after the flotillas had been assembled outside the islands is from thirty to thirty-four hours.

* See Map A.

Embarkation is the next topic. This could and must be effected in one tide. At the six siels there was a mean period of two and a half hours in every twelve, during which the water was high enough. At Norden a rather longer time was available. But this should be amply sufficient if the machinery were in good working order and were punctually set in motion. High water occurs approximately at the same time at all seven outlets, the difference between the two furthest apart, Carolinensiel and Greetsiel, being only half an hour.

Lastly, the special risks attendant on such an expedition are dispassionately weighed. X——, though keenly anxious to recommend his scheme, writes in no blindly sanguine spirit. There are no modern precedents for any invasion in the least degree comparable to that of England by Germany. Any such attempt will be a hazardous experiment. But he argues that the advantages of his method outweigh the risks, and that most of the risks themselves would attach equally to any other method. Whatever skill in prediction was used, bad weather might overtake the expedition. Yes; but if transports were used transhipment into boats for landing would in bad weather be fraught with the same and a greater peril. But transports could stand off and wait. Delay is fatal in any case; unswerving promptitude is the essence of such an enterprise. The lighters would be in danger of foundering? Beside the point; if the end is worth gaining the risks must be faced. Soldiers' lives are sacrificed in tens of thousands on battlefields. The flotilla would be demoralised during transit by the assault of a few torpedo-boats? Granted; but the same would apply to a fleet of transports, with the added certainty that one lucky shot would send to the bottom ten times the number of soldiers, with less hope of rescue. In both cases reliance must be placed on the efficiency and vigilance of the escort. It is admitted, however, in a passage which might well make my two adventurers glow with triumph, that if by any mischance the British discovered what was afoot in good time, and were able to send over a swarm of light-draught boats, which could elude the German warships and get amongst the flotillas while they were still in process of leaving the siels; it is admitted that in that case the expedition was doomed. But it is held that such an event was not to be feared. Reckless pluck is abundant in the British Navy, but expert knowledge of the tides and shoals in these waters is utterly lacking. The British charts are of no value, and there is no evidence (he reports) that the subject has been studied in any way by the British Admiralty. Let me remark here, that I believe Mr. " Davies's " views, as expressed in the earlier chapters, when they were still among the great estuaries, are all absolutely sound. The " channel theory," though it only bore indirectly on the grand issue before them, was true, and should be laid to heart, or I should not have wasted space on it.

One word more, in conclusion. There is an axiom, much in fashion now, that there is no fear of an invasion of the British Isles, because if we lose command of the sea, we can be starved—a cheaper and surer way of reducing us to submission. It is a loose, valueless axiom, but by sheer repetition it is becoming an article of faith. It implies that " command of the sea " is a thing to be won or lost definitely; that we may have it to-day and lose it for ever to-morrow. On the contrary, the chances are that in anything like an even struggle the command of the sea will hang in the balance for an indefinite time. And even against great odds, it would probably be impossible for our enemies so to bar the avenues of our commerce, so to blockade the ports of our extensive coast-line, and so to overcome the interest which neutrals will have in supplying us, as to bring us to our knees in less than two years, during which time we can be recuperating and rebuilding from our unique internal resources, and endeavouring to regain command.

No; the better axiom is that nothing short of a successful invasion could finally compel us to make peace. Our hearts are stout, we hope; but facts are facts; and a successful raid, such as that here sketched, if you will think out its consequences, must appal the stoutest heart. It was checkmated, but others may be conceived. In any case, we know the way in which they look at these things in Germany.

Postscript (March, 1903).

It so happens that while this book was in the press a number of measures have been taken by the Government to counteract some of the very weaknesses and dangers which are alluded to above. A Committee of National Defence has been set up, and the welcome given to it was a truly extraordinary comment on the apathy and confusion which it is designed to supplant. A site on the Forth has been selected for a new North Sea naval base—an excellent if tardy decision; for ten years or so must elapse before the existing anchorage becomes in any sense a "base." A North Sea fleet has also been created—another good measure; but it should be remembered that its ships are not modern, or in the least capable of meeting the principal German squadrons under the circumstances supposed above.

Lastly, a Manning Committee has (among other matters) reported vaguely in favour of a Volunteer Reserve. There is no means of knowing what this recommendation will lead to: let us hope not to the fiasco of the last badly conceived experiment. Is it not becoming patent that the time has come for training all Englishmen systematically either for the sea or for the rifle?

THE END.

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN.

ESTABLISHED 1798

T. NELSON & SONS, LTD.
PRINTERS AND PUBLISHERS